claim to be in the same position as a person with whom the company has made a fresh contract"—namely, a contract to carry him from Stalybridge to Manchester. It may be (but that we have nothing to do with) that by getting out of the train and being very sharp, and getting the booking clerk to issue a ticket to him, a man may give up his ticket at Stalybridge and take a fresh one and be able to go on, but that is not the case we have to deal with. We have to deal with the case of a man who intended to travel from Huddersfield to Manchester by a train as to which the contract price is 2s. 3d., and who avails himself of the facilities offered by that train, and then says, "The measure you are to charge me is what you would have charged me had I booked by that train from Stalybridge, and not Huddersfield." I think it was quite open to the county court judge to find that in that case and under those circumstances the measure of the quantum meruit was the difference between what he would have had to pay had he said "I will take a ticket to Manchester," and what he did pay when he said "I will take a ticket to Stalybridge," Of course it will be understood that I have decided this case upon the conditions being part of the contract, which prohibit re-booking by that train and therefore he was not doing something which the railway company by their conditions allowed him to do, and the conditions did not entitle him to use the Stalybridge ticket for anything except Stalybridge. I am not deciding anything which will prevent the parties from taking proceedings, if they can take any such proceedings under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, and the Acts amending it. I think this was the proper measure or might be the proper measure of the quantum meruit, but in this case there is no illegality in that being awarded. The judgment of the county court judge must be affirmed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, but I am inclined to think it does not make any difference whether he originally intended to book for Manchester or only Stalybridge, because when he elected to stay in the train and go on by that train without re-booking be elected to propose to the company that they should make it one through journey for him from Huddersfield to Manchester, and if so then the company by accepting that altered state of things, instead of turning him out and requiring him to re-book, made a further contract that they would carry him the whole distance from Huddersfield to Manchester, and therefore were entitled to charge the whole fare.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. When you look at the matter the company's terms for the passenger who travels through in the same train and does not get out to re-book and start on a fresh journey are 9d., and I see no reason why, if a gentleman does not make a fresh contract with them, but acts, as my brother has said, as a through passenger, he should not be charged that fare.

SAUNDERSON v. COLLINS. (a.)

Bailment—Bailor and bailee—Carriage lent to bailee—Damage to carriage by servant of bailee not in course of his employment—Liability of bailee for damage.

The plaintiff, a coach builder, lent the defendant a dog-cart whilst he repaired the defendant's trap. The bailee's servant, not acting in the course of his employment, negligently injured the lent dog-cart by driving it into a tramcar.

Held, that the bailor could recover damages from the bailee for the injury done to his dog-cart.

The Coupé Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413, 40 W. R. Dig. 11, followed.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed from a decision of the learned judge of the Newcastle-on-Tyne County Court in favour of the defendant.

The action was brought by a coachbuilder to recover a sum of £22 18s. 6d. for damage to a four-wheeled dog-cart lent by him to the defendant whilst his (the defendant's) dog-cart was being repaired. On the 30th of June the defendant had had the plaintiff's dog-cart out from about three o'clock to five and it was then put away in the coach-house. On that evening there were bonfires in honour of the King's Coronation and the defendant's coachman, without the knowledge or permission of his master (the defendant), got the key of the coach-house and took out the dog-cart and drove it about, taking with him three or four companions. They were all the worse for drink, and as they were returning between eleven and twelve o'clock that evening the coachman drove the horse and trap round a corner on the wrong side of the road and ran into a tramcar, and the dog-cart was badly injured. The defendant stated that he gave his coachman no authority to take the trap out and that he knew nothing of the occurrence till a policeman knocked him up in the night; that the key of the coachhouse was kept in the hall table drawer, and that on the occasion in question he did not give the key to the coachman. Before the county court judge it was argued on behalf of the defendant that he was not responsible for the damage done because the coachman acted altogether outside the scope of his employment and there was no evidence that the defendant had been guilty of any negligence; and it was submitted that plaintiff's remedy was against the coachman, and Mears v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 6 L. T. Rep. 190, 11 C. B. N. S. 850, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 17. was relied on. For the plaintiff it was contended that the defendant was liable because the plaintiff had left the dog-cart in the defendant's custody, and as bailee the defendant was liable for the negligence of his servant, and that the case of The Coupé Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413, 40 W. R. Dig. 11, covered exactly the present case.

The county court judge held that if the case of The Coupé Co. v. Maddick could not be distinguished, he was bound by it to give judgment for the plaintiff; but he distinguished it on the ground that the defendant's servant in wrongfully taking the trap out of his master's coachhouse and damaging it was doing a tortious act in respect of which both the plaintiff and the master had a right of action. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Wallace, K.C., and Mundahl, for the plaintiff.—The distinction which the learned county court judge drew between the facts of this case and that of The Coupé Co. v. Maddick is not one of substance. It was admitted that the coachman was the defendant's servant, and the defendant as bailee is liable for any damage caused to the plaintiff's dog-cart. The position of a bailee is made very clear and the cases dealing with the question are collected in the judgments given in The Winkfield, 50 W. R. 246, [1902] P. 42. If the plaintiff had sued the coachman, then the decision in Mears v. London and South-Western Railway Co. would have been an authority no doubt in his favour, but it is not necessary to consider that case here because The Coupé Co's. case clearly decided that the bailor had a good cause of action against the master.

Manisty, K.C., and Meynell, for the defendant.—The plaintiff cannot rely on The Coupé Co's. case, because there the contract under which the carriage was supplied was one for a year, and the contract was one of time. Here the dog-cart was lent free for a short time only, while repairs were done to the defendant's dog-cart. The obligation of a mere bailee to take reasonable care is limited, so far as concerns his servants, to acts done by them within the scope of their employment. In The Coupé Co.'s case the defendant had used the carriage that afternoon and the wrongful act of the servant consisted in not taking it back at once to the stable. Up to a certain point, therefore, the coachman was acting within the scope of his employment under orders from his master, but here the man secretly took the horse and dog-cart out and drove off to see the bonfires without authority of any kind to do so. In Mitchell v. Crassweller, 1 W. R. 153, 13 C. B. 237, which was decided in 1853, it was laid down, and repeatedly followed, "that a master is responsible for an injury resulting from the negligence of his servant whilst driving his carriage, provided the servant is at the time engaged in his master's business, even though the accident happened in a place to which his master's business did not call him"—that is simply the ground of the decision in The Coupé Co.'s case—"but if the the journey upon which the servant starts be solely for his own purposes and undertaken"—as was the case here—"without the knowledge or consent of his master, the latter is not responsible." Moreover in Storey v. Ashton, 17 W. R. 727, L. R. 4 Q. B. 476, it was held that the master was not liable, because the servant was not doing the act, in doing which he had been guilty of negligence, in the course of his employment as servant.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I wish to say in this case one word about the position of this court. It is so perfectly well known that I think it is scarcely necessary, but I should like to say it in deference to the very able arguments which have been addressed to us. Sitting here as a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division, and I hope doing some useful work, it really would be very injurious to our functions if it was supposed that because we endeavour to constitute a court of authority in these cases we should therefore have imposed upon us the duty to make a refining distinction between cases which have decided substantially the points argued before us, one way or the other. All I say is this. It is impossible to distinguish the case of The Coupé Co. v. Maddick on the ground and distinction which Mr. Manisty has presented to us. If, of course, the real reasoning of the judgment had been that the servant in that case was acting within the scope of his authority, it would be no authority at all against Mr. Manisty; it would be a case which would not be pari materia at all; but in that case the learned county court judge had decided, on the authority of Storey v. Ashton, that the bailee was not liable because the act done was not within the scope of his authority, and Mr. Manisty has very strongly urged before us the principles on which masters are not liable on those cases. That judgment was overruled, and therefore it is impossible to say that the decision proceeded upon the basis that in such a case there was no liability to the hirer. And more than that, other reasons are given in the judgment showing that Cave and Charles, JJ., thought that in the contract of bailment as between bailor and bailee such circumstances as are there referred to—namely, the act of the servant beyond the scope of his authority—did not prevent the bailee being liable.

Now I do not want to say anything about that case, because, as I have already said, it is not a wise thing when you are following a case to enter into judgments for or against it unless it can be distinguished. In my opinion it cannot be distinguished upon any of the grounds Mr. Manisty has pressed upon us; it must be distinguished (if his contention is valid) in the Court of Appeal.

I think in this particular case the judgment in the case of The Coupé Co. v. Maddick was binding upon the county court judge and is binding upon us, and therefore the judgment should be reversed.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Wright, J.) March 23.

Bankruptcy — Scheme of arrangement — Proof — Debt carrying interest exceeding 5 per cent.—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 9; s. 23.

Under a scheme of arrangement which provides for a dividend on all debts provable in bankruptcy, a proof including interest at a rate exceeding 5 per cent. should be admitted in full, and no part thereof rejected or postponed for the purpose of dividend until all the other creditors have been paid in full.

Appeal by a creditor under a scheme of arrangement from the partial rejection of his proof by the official receiver.

A scheme of arrangement with the creditors in accordance with the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, had been approved by the court.

The friends of the bankrupt had raised a sum of £1,800, and the scheme provided that as large a dividend was to be paid upon all debts provable in bankruptcy as the sum collected would admit of. It was admitted that the sum collected was sufficient to pay a composition of 7s. 6d. in the £1 on all the debts proved, even if the appellant's proof were admitted in full. The appellant's proof was for money lent, and interest at a rate exceeding 5 per cent.

The official receiver admitted the proof to the extent of the principal sum advanced and interest thereon at 5 per cent., but rejected it in so far as it consisted of interest at a rate exceeding 5 per cent Such rejection was based on the terms of section 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890:—

"Where a debt has been proved upon a debtor's estate under the principal Act, and such debt includes interest or any pecuniary consideration in lieu of interest, such interest or consideration shall for the purposes of dividend be calculated at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, without prejudice to the right of a creditor to receive out of the estate any higher rate of interest to which he may be entitled after all the debts proved in the estate have been paid in full."

The creditor appealed.

E. Clayton, for the creditor.

S. G. Lushington, for the official receiver.

WRIGHT, J.—I think on the whole I ought to hold that this scheme means what the legal effect of its language is. When it uses the expression "dividend" on the amount provable against the estate it uses those words in the same sense in which they are used in section 3, sub-section 9, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. That, clearly, is debts provable, and not merely debts provable for immediate dividend. That being so, I think the scheme here, if fairly construed, especially if construed according to the facts of the case, means that the whole of the provable debt—that is, the debt, including interest not only up to 5 per cent., but the whole interest in this case—is to be provided for. The only remaining question is, supposing the scheme clearly enough indicates that, is it a competent provision or a void provision? It seems to me clear, that it is competent for the parties, in framing one of these schemes with the approval of the creditors and the court, to exclude some of the provisions which would have effect in the case of bankruptcy without a scheme. I do not see any reason why it should not be competent for them to exclude section 23 of the Act of 1890. I see in the case of In re Athlumney, Ex parte Wilson, 47 W. R. 144, [1898] 2 Q. B. 547, that was the view which I took. I see no reason to alter that view. It is possible for a scheme to exclude that section, and I think, fairly read, this scheme has excluded the section. Therefore the motion must be allowed.

MASON v. OGDEN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Will — Residuary devise — "All other my freehold property"—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 25.

A devise of "all other my freehold messuages or tenements at W. and elsewhere" is a "residuary devise" within the meaning of section 25 of the Wills Act, 1837.

Decision of the Court of Appeal—In re Mason, Ogden v. Mason, [1901] 1 Ch. 619, 49 W. R. Dig. 202—affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ., [1901] 1 Ch. 619, 49 W. R. Dig. 202), reversing a decision of Kekewich, J. (48 W. R. 493, [1900] 2 Ch. 196).

T. W. J. Mason, by his will dated the 27th of January, 1862, devised all his freehold house and shop and all and singular other the premises used by him at the time of his decease at Wimbledon to his son Thomas, and the will proceeded: "And as to all other my freehold messuages or tenements at Wimbledon aforesaid and elsewhere, and all my leasehold estates whatsoever and wheresoever, I give, devise, and bequeath the same unto my dear wife for and during the term of her natural life for her own use and benefit." And after the death of his wife the testator gave the last mentioned freehold and leasehold hereditaments upon the trusts as therein mentioned.

The testator died in May, 1865, possessing at the time of his death freehold property at Wimbledon in addition to that which was specifically devised to his son, and also freeholds at Kingston. He had no copyholds. His will and codicil thereto were attested by his son, so that the specific devise to the son failed. The question was whether this specifically-devised property passed under the devise of "all other" the testator's freehold property or was undisposed of.

Kekewich, J., on the authority of Springett v. Jennings, 19 W. R. 575, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 333, held that the devise of "all other my freehold tenements at Wimbledon and elsewhere" was not, within the meaning of section 25 of the Wills Act, 1837, a residuary devise; but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Warrington, K.C., and George Henderson, for the appellants.

Renshaw, K.C., and C. H. Sargant, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It has been truly observed that this is a very short point, and I confess I have not been able from the first to entertain much doubt about it. I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, and ought to be affirmed.

I am quite content to say that all the three learned judges of the Court of Appeal appear to me to have proceeded on the same line of thought, in which I concur. I should be very sorry indeed to place upon this remedial statute (which is intended to do the very thing which it is suggested this language does not do—that is, to enable the testator to sweep up everything not properly disposed of before) such an artificial meaning as to take away from the persons intended to be benefited that which they were meant to have. To my mind, there is no doubt in the world that what the testator meant to do was that which I think he has done. He has made a perfectly good residuary devise within the meaning of section 25 of the Wills Act, 1837; and therefore I think the judgment is right. I do not want to add anything to what the learned judges in the Court of Appeal have said, because I think they have gone over the whole ground and disposed of the entire question. It appears to me that the argument on the other side rests on a somewhat narrow and artificial construction of the words, looking at what was meant to be done by that section.

Therefore I move that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I entertain the same opinion. I cannot profess to have had any acquaintance with the Wills Act, 1837, prior to the discussion which has taken place to-day, or with what seems to me the peculiar and special state of the law as it existed before that statute; but it appears to me that the reasoning of the learned judges who have dealt with this matter on appeal commends itself to one's good sense.

I confess, so far as I am concerned, I am very strongly moved by the fact that the testator had no copyholds, and I cannot see what good was to be got by putting in the residuary clause "copyholds" when he had none to dispose of. That seems to me to be the whole point in this case. Assuming that universality is required in order to make effectual a proper provision of residue, that requirement is fulfilled where the terms used plainly embrace and describe the whole estate of which the testator died possessed. I can see that the terms of the judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Springett v. Jenings, if strictly followed, would warrant Kekewich, J's., judgment in this case; but I agree with Rigby, L.J., and the other learned judges in the Appellate Court that the observations of Mellish, L.J., are to be read with reference to the particular instrument before him, and do not apply to a case like this, where the testator had by the terms of his will disposed of the whole estate of which he was possessed.

As stated by counsel for the respondents, the word "other" does not seem to make the difficulty which I should have supposed it did but for the authorities. According to these authorities, the word "other" in this disposition does not affect or limit the force of the residuary clause, which would sweep in the property which the testator did intend specially to convey, but which turned out to be ineffectually conveyed because of the circumstance that the beneficiary was unfortunately made a witness to the execution of the will.

I have no hesitation, therefore, in agreeing with your lordships in holding that the judgment should be affirmed with costs.

Lord DAVEY.—I confess I should not have been sorry if this House had seen its way to affirm the decision of Kekewich, J., because it had the effect of giving to Thomas Frederick Mason in his quality as heir-at-law the property which he had lost—that is to say, the property which had been devised to him, and which he would have taken as devisee but for the unhappy accident of his having witnessed his father's will. But I think, on a consideration of the words of the 25th section, this House should affirm the decision of the Court of Appeal.

The question really is reduced to a very small one, although it is of importance to the parties. The testator gives certain freehold property at Wimbledon to his son—a devise which fails; and then he says, "And as to all other my freehold messuages or tenements at Wimbledon aforesaid and elsewhere and all my leasehold estates whatsoever and wheresoever," I give them upon other trusts. Now, the real question is whether the gift of "all other" the testator's freehold messuages and so forth is a residuary gift. One asks oneself, Why not? The gift is precisely the same (that is not disputed) as if he had said, "And as to the residue of my freehold messuages and tenements at Wimbledon and elsewhere." In form it certainly is a residuary gift. Why is it not to be treated as a residuary gift under section 25? Well, the only legal reason I have heard is that it does not possess the attribute of "universality," whatever may be meant by that; and the judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Springett v. Jenings is referred to in support of that proposition. All that I understand that very learned judge to have meant by his expression, which perhaps was not chosen with the felicity which usually distinguishes his judgments, was that a clause which is relied on as a residuary clause must be so framed as to sweep in by its terms the whole of the property to which it applies. I can attach no other meaning to the word "universality." When you are speaking of a residuary gift of personal estate, the clause must be so framed as to be capable of carrying every description of personal estate not otherwise disposed of by the will; and when you are speaking of a residuary gift of real estate generally, it must be so framed as to carry in every atom of real estate; but why we may not have a residuary gift of freehold estate I am at a loss to understand. It is not necessary that a residuary gift shall comprise every kind of property which the man has; for example, you may have a residuary gift of personal estate. The words in the Wills Act are, "shall be included in the residuary devise (if any) contained in such will." Why is it necessary to construe that as meaning a residuary devise of real estate? A residuary devise of real estate has no more the attribute of "universality" than a residuary gift of personal estate or a residuary devise of freeholds. On the other hand, a devise of freeholds has this attribute of "universality" if it is framed in such words as to be capable of sweeping in every description of freehold estate which is not otherwise disposed of.

I think it is not necessary for the construction of section 25 of the Wills Act, 1837, to say that the residuary devise there spoken of must be a residuary devise of the whole of the real estate; and the construction which has been put upon the section by the Court of Appeal, and which your lordships have favoured, seems to me to meet the particular mischief and the particular defect in the previous law which the section was devised to remedy. Therefore I agree with the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I concur.

Held, that an application to the court under the proviso in the above section must be made by counsel.

Hearing of a report made by the Committee of the Incorporated Law Society under the Solicitors Act, 1888.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY and ERSKINE REID, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

It appeared that applications were made by one C. R. Trueman and others that a solicitor should be required to answer allegations contained in certain affidavits.

The committee, having heard the applications and the evidence, found that the charges made by Trueman were not made out, but they found against the solicitor on the other charges, and made a report accordingly.

March 31.—B. A. Cohen, for the Incorporated Law Society, read the report.

The solicitor, appearing in person, denied that he had been guilty of professional misconduct and submitted that the Statutory Committee had in regard to the charges made by persons other than Trueman arrived at a wrong conclusion, and that there was no evidence on which the court ought to find against him.

Trueman claimed to be heard in person on the charges he had made before the committee against the solicitor. He contended that by section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, he was entitled to apply to the court personally to strike a solicitor off the rolls, and he cited In re Lilley, [1892] 1 Q. B. 759.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We think it better to deal first with the application made to the court by the complainant to be heard upon this motion, especially as it is an important matter and one in which we are reaffirming, not laying down, the old practice of the courts in such matters. The section of the Solicitors Act, 1888, which we have to deal with here is as follows: "Provided that any person who but for this Act would have been entitled to apply to the court to strike a solicitor off the roll of solicitors, or to apply to require a solicitor to answer allegations contained in an affidavit, shall be entitled so to apply although the committee is of opinion that there is no primâ facie case of misconduct against the solicitor, and shall be entitled to be heard if the society brings the report of the committee before the court." That preserves the right of a person in the complainant's position in two matters; either he may himself apply on the ground that he has a charge against the solicitor, or when the report is before the court, which is a new right, he shall be allowed to be heard upon it. It has been for many years the practice where applications are made against solicitors to require that they shall be conducted by counsel. The statute is only a modified, improved, and amended procedure whereby the report of the Statutory Committee is brought before the court, and then action is taken upon it. As far back as 1833 there is an authority to which I wish to refer, the case of Ex parte Pitt, 2 Dowl. 439. I refer to it not only because it is an authority on which this court has acted continuously before the Act of 1888, but because the reasons of the judgment are of as full effect and weight to-day as at the time when the judgment was delivered. In that case a gentleman applied in person for a rule to show cause why certain attorneys should not be required to answer certain matters contained in a certain affidavit. That was a much less stringent or a less serious application than the application to strike off the rolls. Those who are old enough to remember the old practice will remember that there were two applications—one to strike off the rolls, and the other to answer the matters of an affidavit—one being more serious than the other, and the court was dealing there with the less serious case, and the application was made to four judges, and Lord Denman, after consulting the other judges and the Master of the Crown Office, said this: "The motion against an attorney being in the nature of a criminal information, the court requires that it should be made by a gentleman at the bar, and it cannot be made in person. Otherwise we have not the sanction of a barrister for the propriety of such an application. We cannot therefore hear you make this motion. The only case in which it appears that the court ever interfered where the application was made in person was where a party demanded protection of the court against an attorney; and as it then appeared on his affidavit that the attorney had been guilty of great misconduct, the court of its own accord directed that he should answer the matters stated on the affidavit of the applicant." In my opinion, for the purpose of entertaining such an application as the complainant desires to make, either to allege that the committee have not gone far enough or that further action ought to be taken by sending the matter back, the court are entitled to the same safeguards that have always been thought necessary in this matter. I desire to add, if we were dealing with the question of costs, if anybody were asking the complainant to pay costs, then either here or elsewhere the complainant would be entitled to be heard in person against such an application. It is when a person seeks to put into force the amended jurisdiction of this court, now governed by the statute of 1888, the words "entitled to be heard" mean entitled to be heard in the way that is in accordance with the practice of the court, and I think in this matter it is not possible for us to hear the complainant in person.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree. I have had very considerable experience in cases of this kind, as for a long period when at the bar I represented the Law Society, and during the fifty years or rather more that I have been in the profession I have never known a case in which an application of this kind was heard, either before or since the Act of 1888, in which the matter was not conducted by counsel. I think the reasons given by Lord Denman in Ex parte Pitt are quite as strong at the present time as they ever were before. I think it is a thoroughly sound practice and ought to be adhered to.

CHANNELL, J.—I entirely agree.

An application by Trueman for an adjournment in order to instruct counsel was refused.

The Court then delivered judgment on the report and came to the conclusion upon the evidence that the charges which the committee had found against the solicitor were not proved.

They therefore held that the solicitor was not guilty of professional misconduct.

Trueman appealed against the refusal to hear him in person.*

June 16th.—The appellant, in person, said that he did not desire to be heard upon the question of striking the solicitor off the rolls or of requiring him to answer the allegations contained in an affidavit, but merely to have the form of the report amended.

The solicitor, who appeared in person, was not called upon.

* A preliminary objection was taken that this was an appeal from an interlocutory order and did not lie without leave. The Court said that in order to appreciate the point they would hear the facts of the case. Having heard the facts, the Court said that it was unnecessary to decide the preliminary objection, as they agreed with the Divisional Court upon the main point under appeal, and that it must not be taken that they decided that the order was not an interlocutory order from which an appeal could be brought without leave.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion, for the reasons given by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills, J., in their judgments in the Divisional Court, there is no ground for this appeal. The case made in the court below was not the same as the case made here. It is evident from the report of the arguments and the judgments in the Divisional Court that the appellant claimed to be heard in person upon the charges made by him against the solicitor. So far as the appellant is claiming to do under the modern machinery that which used to be done under the old machinery by a motion in court calling upon the solicitor to show cause why he should not answer the matters of an affidavit or why he should not be struck off the rolls, he can only be heard if he appears by counsel. The practice which existed under the old procedure has not been altered under the modern system. If, on the other hand, the appellant was not urging matters against the solicitor, but was only applying to be heard upon some question of costs, he would be entitled to be heard in person. It is obvious that what the appellant was seeking to do in the Divisional Court was to prefer a charge against the solicitor. He cannot now alter his ground and by so doing improve his position. What we have to decide is the same question as that which was decided in the Divisional Court, and we decide that question in the same way as that court decided it.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is perfectly clear from the report of the case in the court below that the appellant claimed to be heard in person upon the charges he had made against the solicitor before the committee. The Divisional Court declined to hear him unless he appeared by counsel. An application to strike a solicitor off the rolls is an application of a very serious kind, and it is of importance to maintain the old rule that such an application can only be made upon the authority of counsel. I hope that that rule will be adhered to.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., agreed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The facts were as follow: By her will, dated the 12th of February, 1869, Ann Coley gave her residuary estate upon trust to pay the income thereof to her son, William Coley, during his life, "and from and after his decease to pay the same into the proper hands of his wife for her life, if she shall continue his widow, and she shall not anticipate, charge, or incumber the same; and from and after her decease or second marriage, whichever shall first happen, I direct the trustees and trustee for the time being hereof to divide the said principal moneys and all other (if any) my residuary estate unto and among such of his children as shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years equally, share and share alike as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, each child to have a vested interest at twenty-one years of age or on death under that age leaving lawful issue him or her surviving. But if my said son shall die without leaving lawful issue surviving who shall become entitled under the preceding trusts, I direct the trustees and trustee for the time being hereof after the decease or second marriage of his said widow to divide the whole of my residuary estate unto and among such of my nephews and nieces as shall be living at my decease, and shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years or shall die under that age leaving lawful issue him or her surviving equally, share and share alike as tenants in common and not as joint tenants." The will also contained a proviso empowering the trustees "after the decease or second marriage of any legatee entitled for life or during widowhood, whichever shall first happen," to apply the interest of the presumptive shares of grandchildren or nephews or nieces of the testatrix towards their maintenance.

The testatrix had one child only, the said William Coley, who married in 1861 his first wife, Mary Ann Coley. The testatrix died on the 16th of August, 1870. Mary Ann Coley survived her and died on the 12th of February, 1899. William Coley on the 12th of October, 1899, married his second wife, the defendant Lizzie Coley. He died on the 28th of August, 1902. There was no issue by either marriage. There were several nephews and nieces of the testatrix living at her decease, all of whom had attained twenty-one.

An originating summons was taken out by the surviving trustee of the will to determine whether the defendant Lizzie Coley was entitled to a life interest in the residuary estate of the testatrix.

Kekewich, J., held that on the true construction of the will Lizzie Coley was not entitled to a life interest.

The defendant Lizzie Coley appealed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment the decision of Kekewich, J., must be affirmed. We have to decide whether by the words used in this will the testatrix meant to describe the particular person who was the wife of her son both at the date of the will and at the date of the death of the testatrix, or any person who might at any time be standing in that relationship with her son. It has not been disputed here that when a wife is mentioned in a will, and there is a wife living at the date of the will and at the date of the testator's death, primâ facie, unless there is something in the context to negative the presumption, these words will be taken to refer to that particular wife. Of course that view may be negatived, and it has been said, I think, by Stirling, J., in In re Drew, that there is some conflict of authorities on the point. I doubt, myself, whether there is any material conflict of authorities. You start with that primâ facie rule of construction, and if you get any case which negatives that primâ facie rule of construction then you have a conflict of authorities, but I think there is really none here. It is said that there is a conflict between Boreham v. Bignall and In re Lyne's Trust, but it is not really a conflict of authorities. These two cases present a strong similarity to each other, but it cannot be said that there is a conflict of authorities because in the case of one will one conclusion was arrived at, and in the case of another will which was very like it the court came to another conclusion. It seems to me that each one of these cases in which the general rule of primâ facie presumption was applied must be treated as having been decided on the words of the particular will as modified by the surrounding circumstances. I hope, therefore, that I am right in saying that I am not seeking either to follow or not follow any case decided on a particular will in arriving at the conclusion at which I now come. I start with the primâ facie presumption, and I look to see whether there is sufficient in the will to displace it. Counsel for the appellant put their argument in the only possible way in which, it seems to me, it could be effectively put. They said that if this will is looked at as a whole it is seen that the guiding principle of the testatrix in making the will is to provide for those who are dependent on her son. Whether those persons were dependent on him as being the children of one wife or another wife, her object was to provide for those who stood in the family relation to her son—those persons who remained after his death members of his family. There are indications of some such scheme, but I do not think there is sufficient to justify us in refusing to give to the word "wife" here, its primâ facie and natural meaning. In these circumstances I agree with Kekewich, J., that "wife" in this case means the wife in existence at the dates of the will and of the death of the testatrix, and that a second wife cannot take anything. The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. Personally I do not see any difficulty in this case. It is settled that if there is in a will a gift to the wife of a person and that person has at the time to the knowledge of the testator a wife living, the gift refers to that existing wife and not to any subsequent wife that person may have, unless there is sufficient context to show that the testator is referring to any subsequent wife and that the gift has a different meaning from its primâ facie one. There must, however, be sufficient context to show that; and the only question here is whether there is such sufficient context. I think that there is not. The gift here was to the son for life and after his death to the wife of the son during widowhood; and there was at the date of the will a wife of the son who was known to the testatrix, so that primâ facie she must be taken as referring to that wife. Then after the death of the son and the wife there is a gift to the children of the son—that is to say, the gift in remainder of the corpus is not limited to the children of the existing wife, but extends to the children of the son by any wife. In my opinion there is no sufficient reason for departing from the primâ facie meaning of the word "wife" in this will. I cannot see why a testator should not wish to give a life interest to an existing person as the wife of another person and at the same time desire to give the corpus after the death of that wife to the children of her husband whether by that wife or by any other wife. It seems to me that the two gifts here are perfectly consistent with one another, and we cannot infer from the gift to the children that the word "wife" in the first gift is to have a different meaning from the primâ facie one. I think, therefore, that on the facts this case is clear. I wish to add that I think that the decision in In re Burrow's Trusts was right. The circumstances of In re Lyne's Trust are not clear, and that case may be distinguishable, but to my mind it was not rightly decided, and that seems to have been the opinion of Sir George Jessel in Firth v. Fielden. The report of that case is not satisfactory, as it does not set out the judgment, but I gather that In re Lyne's Trust was not followed. In my opinion the decision of Kekewich, J., was right and the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—I agree. The general principle to be applied to the construction of a gift of this kind is well settled, but it is said that there is in this particular will a context which enables us to give a larger meaning to the word "wife" than its primâ facie meaning. I agree with what Romer, L.J., has said with regard to In re Burrow's Trust, which was, if I may say so, in my opinion, rightly decided by Kindersley, V.C., and as at present advised I do not agree with the decision in In re Lyne's Trust.

DOUGHTY v. LOMAGUNDA REEFS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Sale of assets to another company—Shares in purchasing company—Voluntary winding up—Dissentient member—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161.

Appeal from the decision of Buckley, J. (reported ante, p. 29, [1902] 2 Ch. 837), dismissed on technical grounds.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported ante, p. 29, [1902] 2 Ch. 837).

The defendant company was a limited company, one of whose objects, as stated in its memorandum of association, was to sell its undertaking.

The defendant company entered into an agreement with the Lomagunda Development Co. to sell to the latter company its undertaking and all its property except £200 in consideration of shares in the purchasing company and of an indemnity to itself and its liquidators against certain obligations. The £200 was to be kept to defray the costs of the agreement and of the winding up of the company, and the balance was to be handed over to the purchasing company.

This agreement was approved at an extraordinary general meeting of the company, and at the same meeting was passed a resolution (subsequently duly confirmed) to wind up the company voluntarily.

The plaintiff, who was a shareholder in the company, objected to the sale and claimed that it was ultra vires unless his interest was purchased under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Buckley, J., held that the sale was a sale by the defendant company under its memorandum of association and not a sale in disguise by its liquidator. The sale was therefore valid and the action must be dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hart, for the appellant.

In the course of the argument their lordships intimated that they could not decide that the agreement was ultra vires in the absence of the purchasing company.

The plaintiff declined to incur the expense of bringing the purchasing company before the court by amendment.

Astbury, K.C., and Holmes, for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

THE COURT (COLLINS, M.R., and ROMER and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.) dismissed the appeal, without expressing any opinion as to the rights of the parties, on the ground that the relief claimed by the plaintiff could not be granted in the absence of the purchasing company, as to grant such relief would involve a declaration that the agreement for sale was void.

By section 18 of the Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1872, it is provided that "in case any consumer leave the premises where gas was supplied to him without paying to the company the rate or meter rent due from him, the company shall not require from the next tenant of the premises payment of the arrears so left unpaid, unless the incoming tenant agreed with the defaulting consumer to pay such arrears, or unless the incoming tenant shall continue the trade or business of the outgoing tenant and shall have paid to the owner, lessee, or mortgagee in possession or to the outgoing tenant of such premises a consideration for so doing; but the company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant, as required by this Act, on being required by him to do so."

Held, that, by virtue of the above section, arrears of rent left due for gas supplied to a tenant of premises who has sold the lease thereof and the goodwill of the business he carried thereon to an incoming tenant, who continued the trade or business of the outgoing tenant on the said premises, may be recovered by action by the gas company from the incoming tenant.

Decision in Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead (45 L. J. M. C. 71, 24 W. R. Dig. 111) overruled.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.), confirming the decision of the learned judge of the Clerkenwell County Court.

The action was for the sum of £10 1s. 3d. in respect of gas supplied by the plaintiffs, and the question raised was whether, having regard to section 18 of the Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act of 1872, the plaintiff company had a right to sue a successor in premises for arrears of gas rent left unpaid by his predecessor in cases falling within the exceptions contained in that section, or whether their only remedy was to cut off the supply of gas under section 16 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15).

It appeared that up to the 18th of June, 1901, one J. R. Lowles had been the lessee and occupier of a house in the Harrow-road, where he carried on business as a grocer and retail wine and spirit and beer merchant. On that date Lowles sold his interest in the premises and the goodwill of his business to the defendants, and gave up possession, leaving £10 1s. 3d. due for arrears of gas supplied to him by the plaintiffs. The defendants entered into possession and contined to carry on the business on the premises. The gas company thereupon sued the defendants in respect of these arrears, and the learned county court judge gave judgment for the defendants on the authority of The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead, 45 L. J. M. C. 71, 24 W. R. Dig. 111, which judgment the Divisional Court affirmed.

The plaintiff now appealed.

Section 18 of the Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1842 (35 & 36 Vict. c. xxiii.), provides that: "In case any consumer leave the premises where gas was supplied to him without paying to the company the rate or meter rent due from him, the company shall not require from the next tenant of the premises payment of the arrears so left unpaid, unless the incoming tenant agreed with the defaulting consumer to pay such arrears, or unless the incoming tenant shall continue the trade or business of the outgoing tenant and shall have paid to the owner, lessee, or mortgagee in possession or to the outgoing tenant of such premises a consideration for so doing; but the company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant as required by this Act on being required by him to do so."

Section 16 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15), provides that: "If any person supplied with gas by virtue of this or the special Act neglect to pay the rent due for the same to the undertakers, the undertakers may stop the gas from entering the premises of such person by cutting off the service pipe . . . and recover the rent due from such person."

Section 39 of the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), provides that: "In case any consumer leave the premises where gas was supplied to him without paying to the gas company the rate or meter rent due from him, the gas company shall not require from the next tenant of the premises payment of the arrears so left unpaid, unless the incoming tenant agreed with the defaulting consumer to pay the arrears; but the gas company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant as required by this Act on being required by him so to do."

Danckwerts, K.C. (R. E. Vaughan Williams with him), for the appellants.—The decision in the case of The Gas Light and Coke Co v. Mead was wrong. The gas company are not, in such a case as this, entitled to refuse to supply gas to an occupier of premises on account of the previous occupier having left the premises while owing arrears for gas supplied to him whilst he was in occupation. The gas company are only empowered by section 16 of the Act of 1847 to cut off the supply of gas to the premises while the person in default is in occupation of the premises. The power to cut off or refuse supply to the premises does not extend to premises after the person owing the arrears has ceased to occupy the premises. That being so, the gas company would have no remedy in this case unless they are intended to have power under section 18 of their Act of 1872 of recovering by action arrears of gas in cases included in the exceptions to that section. The only reasonable construction to place on the word "require" in that section is that the company have a right to recover the arrears from the incoming tenant: see Paterson v. Gas Light and Coke Co., 45 W. R. 39, [1896] 2 Ch. 476. Rigby, L.J., in referring in his judgment at p. 42 to the words of section 18 beginning "shall not require" says: "I gather from that, that they," the gas company, "are to have a right to require payment from the incoming tenant in the cases that are provided for by the words of that section; and as correlative to that right they are to have the duty of supplying the incoming tenant as required by this Act on being requested by him to do so."

A. H. Spokes, for the respondents.—Section 18 does not make use of the word "recover"; it says "require." The true construction of this section is not that in cases coming within the exceptions therein the gas company are given any right to recover from the incoming tenant the arrears incurred by the outgoing tenant, but merely that in the two excepted cases they may make the payment of such arrears by the incoming tenant a condition precedent to the supply of gas to him. It is not a reasonable construction of the section to say that it imposes a personal liability on the incoming tenant in respect of the debt contracted by the former occupier. The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead is an authority in support of this contention, and the decision in that case ought not lightly to be overruled.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question we have to decide in this case is whether or not, having regard to the terms of section 18 of the Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1872, that company have a right to sue a successor on premises for arrears left unpaid by his predecessor in cases falling within the exceptions introduced by the word "unless" in section 18. [His lordship here read section 18.] It has been argued on behalf of the respondents that the section uses, not the word "recover," but "require," and that with regard to the cases falling within the exceptions the right of the company is not to recover these arrears by action under sections 70 and 71 of their Act of 1868, but merely to insist upon the payment of the arrears as a condition precedent to any future supply. In support of this argument our attention was called to the case of the Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead, and I must say that that decision is a direct authority in favour of that argument. That case was decided by Blackburn, J., and Lush, J. We therefore, in dealing with the argument before us, have to consider, before we can reject that argument, whether or not the decision in the Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead was right.

Now, in my judgment, that decision was not right. It is said that that decision, given in 1876, ought not to be lightly overruled. I quite agree there, but at the same time, if, when we come to look at the decision, we arrive at the conclusion that it is wrong, our duty here is to give effect to that conclusion. Now, when we look at the judgments in that case we must, in order really to understand them, read the observations made by the learned judges in the course of the argument. Blackburn, J., there observes, at p. 73, as follows: "Under 10 Vict. c. 15 there was no compulsory enactment for the supply of gas, but a permissive power. Then it was provided that if the consumer did not pay his supply might be cut off. Then under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 125, ss. 14, 15, and 16, supply was compulsory, but you must make a contract; and section 39, upon that state of things, was inserted in favour of the incoming tenant, providing that his supply should not be cut off for his predecessor's arrears, unless he had agreed to pay them." Now it seems to me that when we look at the judgment of Blackburn, J., in the light of that observation, it is perfectly plain that he assumed that section 16 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, did give the gas company a right to cut off the supply of the successor for his predecessor's arrears; but if we look at that section we shall see that it does nothing of the kind. [His lordship here read section 16 of the Act of 1847.] That section does not give the power of cutting of the gas from the premises of an occupier by reason of the default of his predecessor. Then we come to the Metropolis Gas Act of 1860, section 39 of which deals with the case of an outgoing and an incoming tenant. [His lordship then read this section.] Therefore, it seems to me that the result of section 16 of the Act of 1847 and section 39 of the Act of 1860 combined, is that the gas company are in all cases bound to supply the occupier of premises notwithstanding that arrears are due from his predessor in respect of gas supplied to him, unless there be collusion between the outgoing and the incoming tenant. I have gone thus at length into these sections to enable me to deal with the argument put forth that the intention of section 18 of the company's Act of 1872, by using the word "require," was to enable the gas company to impose the payment by the incoming tenant of an outgoing tenant's arrears as a condition precedent to supplying him with gas; but the real truth of the matter is that the gas company has no such power. The only case in which the gas company can refuse by reason of the non-payment of these arrears to supply the new occupier with gas, is where he is acting in collusion with his predecessor, by which I understand is meant a case where he is acting in concert with his predecessor in doing something to prevent the gas company recovering. It has been suggested in the course of the argument that there might be a possible case of that kind where the succession is not a real succession, but the outgoing tenant continues to have an interest of some sort or kind in the premises notwithstanding that he has left them.

Under such circumstances it seems to me plain that the gas company would have really no effective remedy. It is plain that they could not use as a lever to compel payment of the arrears a refusal to supply the occupier with gas, because the words at the end of section 18 compel that this shall be done and that the supply shall remain. Under these circumstances some meaning must be given to the word "require" in section 18, and it seems to me that the only reasonable one is that which is put upon it by Rigby, L.J., in his observations in the course of his judgment in the case of Paterson v. The Gas Light and Coke Co.

I agree with the learned judges in the court below in the present case that those observations of Rigby, L.J., cannot be treated as a judgment on the point; it seems to me that they are obiter. The learned judge puts it in the clearest way that his view is that in the cases included in the exceptions in section 18, the gas company is to have the right of suing or proceeding against the then occupier for the arrears of his predecessor. It does not seem to me, if one takes into consideration the reason for it, that there is in such a case any hardship upon the successor. It would be a very much more harsh procedure if the gas company were to be entitled to refuse to supply the occupier with gas, or were to be entitled, in a case where the supply had begun, to cut it off on account of the debt of the predecessor; and it seems to me that at the same time the Act of Parliament made the supply of gas compulsory, and only relieved the gas company from the supply in the one case of collusion between the outgoing and the incoming tenant, it would have been very unreasonable to leave the gas company without any remedy at all. It seems to me that there is no real remedy left to the gas company unless one reads the word "require" as covering the word "recover," and the having personal recourse to the then occupier for the arrears due by his predecessor. Under these circumstances I think we ought not to follow the decision in the case of The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead.

It is now only necessary to make one observation as to the power of recovery given to the gas company by their Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cvi.). Section 71 reads as follows: "Whenever any person fails to pay any gas rent or meter rent or sum due and payable by him to the company, the company may recover the same in any court of competent jurisdiction for the recovery of debts of like amount, and the remedies of the company under this section shall be in addition to their other remedies for the recovery of the rent or sum." It seems to me that under that section, having regard also to section 18 of the Act of 1872, the Gas Light and Coke Co. have in this case the right to proceed against the successor, which is the Cannon Brewery Co., for the debt of the predecessor. The Cannon Brewery Co. come within the exceptions mentioned in section 18 of the Act of 1872, for they in fact have bought the goodwill and interest of the outgoing tenant in premises. For these reasons I think this appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—This case, is certainly not free from difficulty, whether we regard the simple language of the Act or whether we look at the cases in which section 18 has been considered by various courts. It is no doubt an extraordinary thing and an unusual provision on the part of the Legislature that a person who has not incurred a debt shall be held liable to pay it; but nevertheless there may be cases in which justice requires that that should be done. What we have to ascertain is whether the language with which we have to deal is sufficient to enable us to hold that that intention is to be attributed to the Legislature in the present case. Section 18 provides shortly that where an outgoing tenant has left his premises with arrears due to the gas company in respect of the supply of gas, the company is not to require from the next tenant payment of the arrears except in two circumstances, under one of which the case which we have now to consider falls. Then it goes on to provide that the company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing tenant and the incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant on being required by him to do so.

The question that we have therefore to consider is whether that section imposes an obligation on the incoming tenant to pay the arrears in the two excepted cases, or whether the payment of those arrears only forms a condition precedent to the supply of gas to the incoming tenant. The result of the argument on behalf of the respondents is this, that unless the company can insist on not supplying the gas until the arrears have been paid they have got no other remedy; that is to say, that even if the incoming tenant requires a supply and the company proceed to supply him, he is not liable for the arrears, and the only remedy the company has is to refuse to supply him and so put pressure upon him to pay the arrears. Now I do not think that that is the fair consequence of the language used, and in support of my opinion I have certainly, as it seems to me, the opinion in the first place of Lush, J., in the case of The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead, because he there says: "If we were only to look at the construction of the company's own private Acts, without reference to previous legislation upon the subject in the public Acts which are incorporated with them, the inference would be an obvious one that a liability existed in this case which the magistrate could enforce." So that his opinion was that the construction which he gave to the Act was only to be derived from the consideration of the prior public legislation on the subject of gas supplied. In the next place there is the opinion which Rigby, L.J., has expressed in his considered judgment in the case of Paterson v. The Gas Light and Coke Co., and this is to the same effect. So that we have, as it seems to me, the opinion of two learned judges on the natural meaning of the language which is found in this section.

What is now contended is, and it was so held in the case of The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead, that the history of the previous legislation shows that the right was only to abstain from supplying. Now, in the first place, there seems to me great difficulty in so holding upon the language of the section in itself, because the provision is that "the company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant as required by this Act on being required by him to do so." That is to say, in the absence of collusion gas shall be supplied to the incoming tenant in accordance with the Act upon his requiring them so to do.

Now, when we come to examine the grounds of the decision in Mead's case, it appears to me that they are rested on this, that there existed under the prior Acts a right on the part of the company to cut off the supply. Now the only right to cut off the supply which existed under the prior legislation was that conferred by section 16 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847. That appears to me to be limited to the case where the premises on which the gas is supplied are the premises of the person who had been supplied with the gas, and is inapplicable to such a case as the present, where the supply has been to one person, and the title of the occupier against whom the rate is sought to be enforced is an independent title, and the premises have ceased to be the property of the person who had made default in paying for the gas supplied. I think that the reasoning of those learned judges was less satisfactory than that of Rigby, L.J., in the case of Paterson v. The Gas Light and Coke Co.

For these reasons I think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—In this case the question submitted to us from the Divisional Court is whether or not the decision in the case of The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead can be upheld, and I am of opinion, when the ground of that decision is looked into, that the case is not one which ought to be treated as a binding authority, because the learned judges appear not to have adverted to the fact that under the enactments of the statute with which they were dealing the company was prohibited from cutting off the supply of gas. [His lordship here read section 18.] Now what is the meaning of the word "require" in the case where there has been an agreement between the outgoing and the incoming tenant that the latter shall pay the arrears? Surely it is quite clear the word "require" there means "insist on their right to be paid"; that on the incoming tenant failing to pay he shall be in the same position as the outgoing tenant, and the company shall be entitled to insist on the arrears being paid by the incoming tenant. This section further contains the additional exception—not found in section 39 of the Act of 1860—namely, "unless the incoming tenant shall continue the trade or business of the outgoing tenant and shall have paid to the owner, lessee, or mortgagee in possession or to the outgoing tenant of such premises a consideration for so doing." The result of the meaning of the word "require" in regard to this exception is the same as in regard to the other. Then the section contains a proviso that, notwithstanding such arrears, the company shall, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply the incoming tenant with gas. The section therefore recognizes the right of the incoming tenant to be supplied with gas. That appears to me to be a clear interpretation of the section. We have in addition to the valuable judgment of Rigby, L.J., in Paterson v. The Gas Light and Coke Co., the statement of Lush, J., in the case of The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Mead, as to the way in which he interpreted this section by considering the history of the earlier legislation, and the application of the earlier legislation does not appear to me to have been as clear as it might have been. I think, therefore, this appeal ought to be allowed.

Trustee — Trust estate — Unauthorized investments — Jurisdiction of the court to allow trustees to hold unauthorized investments—Practice.

It is not the practice of the court to allow trustees to take an investment, which is not authorized by the trust instrument, upon the ground only that it is beneficial to the beneficiaries. But the court will in some cases, justified by practical necessity, in the exercise of its extraordinary jurisdiction, go beyond the express terms of the instrument creating the trust, with regard to investment.

This was a summons in which a tenant for life under certain wills comprising considerable personal estate applied to the court to sanction a change of investment not authorized by the instrument of trust upon the ground that the proposed change would be beneficial to the beneficiaries. The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case was argued before Kekewich, J., in chambers, but his lordship delivered the following judgment in court.

KEKEWICH, J.—The applicant is tenant for life under certain wills of a large amount of personal estate. Subject to that life interest the property goes to the applicant's children other than her eldest son, she having a power of appointment in the usual form. That power has been extensively exercised, and the appointees have settled their shares so that their children born or unborn have become interested. In order to raise money for purposes which need not be specified the applicant has insured her life for large amounts in first-class offices and has mortgaged her life estate to secure interest and premiums. It is proposed that the trustees of the wills should take over this security. The policies afford an ample margin as regards capital, and the income of the trust estate is largely in excess of the interest and premiums, so that the transaction may be regarded as perfectly safe. The advantage consists in this. In order to take over the security the trustees should realize trust investments which may be taken to yield 3 per cent. per annum, but the mortgage interest is calculated on a rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, and the amount of the mortgage debt is such that the difference of ½ per cent. would make a large addition to the applicant's income. That this would be a boon to her personally goes without saying. But the application is in nowise based on her personal benefit. She has been in the habit of making an allowance to her husband, who is without means, and also to her eldest son, who, as already mentioned, is not interested in the trust estate. She wishes to make some provision for him, because, unfortunately, the reason for his exclusion from interest in the trust estate has ceased, and he also is without means. The wish to make such provision is not the only motive for the application, but it is one of considerable weight. Those other reasons may thus be summarized. All the children (excluding, as henceforward is done, the eldest son), or perhaps all but one daughter, are more or less dependent on the mother, and that one daughter receives an annuity under one of the covenants now to be mentioned. The mother has by settlements made on the marriages of the children covenanted to make annual payments, and she has been in the habit of making voluntary allowances to those entitled under the covenants and the other children. These covenanted payments and voluntary allowances are generous, and perhaps in excess of prudence, having regard to the mortgage debt, or rather to the interest thereon and the premiums, which together form a large deduction from the lady's income, but they are not out of proportion to the ultimate beneficial interests of the children in the settled property. She finds it difficult to maintain these payments and allowances, and also to keep up the house in which she resides, and which she naturally wishes to keep up as a family home. She foresees increasing demands on her purse, and she is at loss to know how to meet them without an increase of income. The proposed transaction would give that increase to so substantial an extent as to enable her to do what she desires, and it is not open to doubt that this would be for the benefit of the children, the position of each of whom is stated in the affidavits.

It being impossible to suggest that the proposed investment is authorized by the instruments of trust, the question is whether, assuming it to be safe and beneficial, the court can or ought to sanction it. Generally speaking the function and duty of the court is to administer the trusts which are placed under its control, and not to exceed the limits of investment or application fixed, on their true construction, by the instruments creating the trusts. There is authority, to be presently mentioned, for saying that there are exceptions to this general rule, but it will be convenient first to state what, according to my experience, has been the practice of the court. The statement must necessarily be according to my experience, because applications of this character are almost universally disposed of in chambers, and although there is, of course, an interchange of opinion between the judges on such subjects, the detailed facts and circumstances of each particular case can be thoroughly known only to the judge to whom the application is made, and he alone is responsible for the ultimate order. It may be assumed that judges have differed in their views of their powers and duties and in the exercise of them, but I do not believe that there has been any substantial variation from the practice which has prevailed in my own chambers. The most common application for going beyond the administration of a trust according to the instrument creating it, is one for advances for the benefit of an infant out of capital. I have never hesitated to do this, where satisfied that the advancement is certainly beneficial, and where the infant is contingently interested, as, for instance, entitled only on attaining majority, I have included in the advance the sum necessary to effect a policy of insurance to cover the contingency. This is an illustration of the maxim that necessity has no law. Another frequent application has been of this character. A testator engaged in trade has failed to make provision for its continuance, and perhaps has even directed it to be realized, but realization, except at break-up prices, is found to be impossible, whereas the business yields an income for the maintenance of the family, which would otherwise be left without adequate support. It is proposed to carry on the business, and perhaps even to apply some part of the estate in purchase of stock-in-trade. Applications to this end require exceeding care, which must not cease with the first order; but the exercise of such extraordinary jurisdiction has the sanction of established practice and is generally justified by beneficial results. Almost equally frequent of late years have been applications for the sale to a joint stock company of the business owned by a testator, or in which he had a share, where no power for that purpose can be found in the will. The inherent difficulty here lies in the circumstance that a newly-formed company cannot pay more than a small proportion of the purchase-money in cash, but can only offer shares or debentures in which the trustees of the will are seldom authorized to invest. Here again it behoves the judge to be cautious down to the most minute details, but if he is satisfied that for the want of working capital or other reason the business cannot be carried on as perhaps the testator intended it should be, and that no sale for cash is possible, so that the proposed scheme affords the only practicable means of extricating the family from their embarrassments, there is no sufficient objection to its sanction by the court. But I have uniformly declined to allow the trustees to hold the shares and debentures as proper investments of the trust estate. Immediate realization is generally impossible and sales can probably be effected to reasonable advantage only in small parcels, judiciously put on the market. Thus far I have considered retention, sometimes extended by successive orders and as regards some of the shares and debentures over a considerable period, which has occasionally been fixed with reference to the majority of a son engaged in the business likely to accept them in satisfaction of his portion, but realization as the ultimate object to be distinctly kept in view has always been insisted on. Analogous to this class of cases is that where what is called reconstruction of a company is contemplated. This seldom occurs unless the original company has proved a failure in some way or to some extent, and the object is by the introduction of new capital or otherwise to place the concern on a sound and profitable footing. This may be, and often is, a matter of exceeding urgency. In granting applications for leave to concur in the reconstruction and to accept shares or debentures in the new company, the question of retaining them has always been dealt with on the same lines, and realization at the first convenient opportunity has ever been directed and enforced.

One other illustration may perhaps be usefully mentioned. A testator possessed of a mortgage of freehold estate settles the mortgage debt with other property. Possibly he contemplates that the mortgage may be paid off and provides for the investment of the money received, together with his other property, in different modes, not including the purchase of real estate. Circumstances arise which render it necessary for the trustees of the will to enforce their security, and, the mortgage debt not being forthcoming, and a sale being practically impossible, they apply to the court for leave to commence an action of foreclosure. The court sanctions it if satisfied that this is the best thing to do; but, an order of foreclosure absolute having been obtained, the court does not sanction the trustees to continue the holding the freehold estate now vested in them as part of the property settled by the testator's will. The court insists on sale, not perhaps immediately or at enormous sacrifice, but as soon as possible, because to do otherwise would be (using the language of Buckley, J., in a case to be presently mentioned) to authorize trustees to take, on the ground that it is a beneficial investment, that which the testator has not authorized.

The above are illustrations of the exercise by the court, justified by practical necessity, of jurisdiction going beyond the mere administration of trusts according to the terms of the instruments creating them. Others might be given, the applications, or, rather, the circumstances inducing them, exhibiting large varieties, but those mentioned suffice to explain the scope of the practice of the court.

There might be added illustrations of the refusal of the court to exercise this extraordinary jurisdiction, but there is no occasion. All the cases of refusal may be grouped under one of two classes. Either, notwithstanding the advantage (actual and prospective) of what is proposed to be done, there is no urgency for it, and the existing state of things may, without great mischief, be allowed to remain; or the terms on which the advantage can be gained are such that the court would, by accepting them, create a new trust in lieu of that which it is administering.

Turning now to the authorities, about The West of England and South Wales District Bank v. Murch, 31 W. R. 467, 23 Ch. D. 138, decided by Fry, J., little need be said. The judgment of the learned judge, so far as it concerns us, is entirely based on an executor's power to compromise, which is not here in question. In re Crawshay, 33 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 126, 60 L. T. Rep. 357, decided by North, J., may also be treated briefly. That was a proposed sale of the business of a testator to a joint stock company, one of the terms being the allocation of shares and debentures of that company among the persons interested under the will in the properties proposed to be sold. This scheme is obviously and entirely different from one for sale of a business in consideration of shares and debentures to be issued to the trustees for retention for a limited time and ultimate realization, and it was in fact an application to the court to sanction a compulsory taking by beneficiaries of shares and debentures in lieu of their proper proportions of the estate. It was a monstrous proposition, and would not, I believe, have received the shadow of sanction from any judge. North, J., refused it without hesitation. This is his language: "I should not be administering the trusts created by the testator if I consented to this scheme; I should be altering his trusts and substituting something quite outside the will." In re Morrison, 49 W. R. 441, [1901] 1 Ch. 701, was a case of different character. There it was proposed to sell the business of a testator to a joint stock company in consideration of shares and debenture stock, which it was intended the trustees should hold as long as they should think fit, as if the same had formed part of the estate of the testator. Buckley, J., refused the application saying that, in his opinion, "there does not reside in this court any power to authorize trustees to take, on the ground that it is a beneficial investment, that which the testator has not authorized." I entirely agree with him, but note that the gist of the decision lies in the words "on the ground that it is beneficial," and to omit to give due weight to this is to misinterpret it. The alternative of holding the shares and debenture stock for a limited period with a view to realization was not suggested to or by the court, and it may be that such alternative would have been unacceptable to the parties concerned or practicably impossible. The case is no authority for saying that the alternative order could not have been properly made. It is not for me to say that in the subsequent case, now to be noticed, Cozens-Hardy, J., ought to have made an order in the alternative form, but at any rate, if I may venture to say so, he took a prudent course in leaving the matter to be dealt with by the Court of Appeal. This is the case of In re New's Settlement, 50 W. R. 17, [1901] 2 Ch. 534, where there were applications in no less than three estates. The trustees of each estate held shares in the Wollaton Colliery Co. (Limited), the reconstruction of which, for urgent and good reasons, was proposed. One set of trustees had power to invest in shares and debentures, but the other two had not. The Court of Appeal held that the trustees of all three might have liberty to concur in the reconstruction, but that those trustees who had no power to invest in shares or debentures of such a company as was intended to be formed must undertake to apply to the court for leave to further retain the shares and debentures received under the scheme of reconstruction if they desired to retain them beyond one year from the time when the reconstruction was carried out. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was delivered by Romer, L.J. He required that the then existing evidence should be supplemented so as to make clear the points urged in the course of argument as to the importance of further capital being provided by the proposed reconstruction of the company, the issue of debentures by the new company and the difficulties which would arise if the trustees were obliged to stand aloof and take no part in any reconstruction. This no doubt was done and such evidence must be taken to be essential to the decision. So far as the last point to which evidence was to be directed is concerned, there is no occasion to dwell on it, because it points directly and solely to the power of compromise which is recognized in the judgment, and, as already stated, there is nothing of this kind here. The foundation of the exercise of jurisdiction by the court is to be found in an interlocutory observation by Romer, L.J., speaking, no doubt, on behalf of the other Lords Justices as well as himself. He says: "The principle seems to be this: that the court may on an emergency do something not authorized by the trust. It has no general power to interfere with or disregard the trust, but there are cases where the court has gone beyond the express provisions of the trust instrument—cases of emergency, cases not foreseen or provided for by the author of the trust where the circumstances require that something should be done. There is a passage in the considered judgment ([1901, 2 Ch., at p. 545) which substantially expresses the same view in different language, and both passages must be taken to be controlled by the caution respecting the exercise by the court of extraordinary jurisdiction. Observe that the Lord Justice adds, "It need scarcely be said that the court will not be justified in sanctioning every act desired by trustees and beneficiaries merely because it may appear beneficial to the estate."

But the really important observation with reference to the case in hand is that the Court of Appeal, while sanctioning the concurrence of the trustees in the scheme of reconstruction, did not sanction the retention of shares or debentures by the trustees who had no power of making an investment of that character. They made the very order which, as already explained, it has been the practice of the court to make, at least in my chambers, in cases of this character. It was argued before me that the decision in In re New's Settlement introduced a novel principle or rule, and that in many cases where the court has refused to sanction proposals going outside the administration of the trusts according to the terms of the instrument creating them, the result would have been different if the judge had had the decision in In re New's Settlement before him. From that I entirely dissent. The decision is valuable and useful as giving the authority of the Court of Appeal to what otherwise depended on the practice of the court and to some extent the views of particular judges, but it does not purport to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court or justify the court sanctioning any scheme which might not have been sanctioned without it. In this particular case I have nothing more than a proposal to sanction a change of investment, not authorized by the instrument of trust, on the ground that it will be to the advantage of the beneficiaries. From what I have mentioned at the outset of the judgment, it might be urged that this ground is somewhat too broadly stated, but even assuming that such advantage is proved, I have just that application which Buckley, J., in In re Morrison, distinctly said could not be granted. Does the judgment of the Court of Appeal afford any reason for departing from what was said by that learned judge? I can find none.

There was a new point made before me, it was mooted before, but I am not aware of any judicial dictum on it, and it is not noticed in the arguments or in the judgments in any of the cases cited. The point is that the jurisdiction of the court has by implication been enlarged by section 3 of the Judicial Trustee Act, 1896. This enactment enables the court to relieve a trustee either wholly or partially from liability for a breach of trust. This can only be done where the court is convinced that the trustee has acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to have been excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the direction of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach. This last provision postulates a duty in the trustee to obtain the direction of the court, and negligence in the omission to do it, which negligence may nevertheless be excused. It is difficult to see how a trustee could be excused for such negligence if the court, when in possession of all the facts, were convinced that he could not have been with any propriety or on any terms directed to commit the breach of trust which he in fact committed. That, however, need not be further discussed. The point made is that inasmuch as the court now has authority to excuse a trustee from liability for a breach of trust committed, or, in other words, to bind the beneficiaries to accept what was done as if it were no breach of trust at all, therefore the court must have power to exercise that authority by anticipation, and to excuse a trustee from liability for a breach of trust contemplated. I am not convinced. The statutory provision, though, if I may venture to say so, not a good example of clear and careful legislation, has undoubtedly proved useful; but to extend it, as proposed, by implication, and to say that the court can sanction any dealing with trust property, however discordant from the trusts declared, provided only it be honest and reasonable, would be a subversion of principle. If the Legislature intends to confer that power on the court it must do so in express and unambiguous terms.

There will be no order on the summons. I doubt whether the action is so constituted as to justify my giving any direction respecting the payment of costs out of the estate. The trustees are, of course, entitled to take theirs as costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred, but even as regards them I do not as at present advised see my way to giving any directions.

MULLIS v. HUBBARD. (a.)

Local government—Buildings—Erection of premises in advance of building line—Plans submitted to urban authority—Approval of plans—Written consent—Action by private individual—Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.

By the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, s. 3, it is not lawful, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof, and any person offending is liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice in this behalf from the urban authority. The defendant prepared plans which showed that the buildings he intended to erect would be brought forward beyond the front main line, and these plans were produced before, and passed by, the urban authority. The plaintiff, who was the owner of the adjoining premises, alleged special damage, and claimed a mandatory injunction.

Held (1) that the plaintiff as a private individual had no right of action under the above section; and (2) that the resolution of the urban authority approving the plans constituted "written consent" within the meaning of the said section.

This was an action under section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, by which buildings are not allowed to be brought forward beyond the front main line of the street without the consent of the urban authority.

The plaintiff and defendant were burgesses of the town of Loughborough.

On the 12th of November, 1900, plans of a building were submitted to the corporation of Loughborough on behalf of the defendant.

On the 20th of November the borough surveyor certified that the plans were in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), and the bye-laws of the corporation, and on the 26th of November they were approved by a committee of the corporation subject to an amendment. At the same time the chairman of the committee stamped the plans with the words "Approved subject to amendment." This amendment was carried out.

On the 3rd of December, 1900, the corporation, at a general meeting, approved of the proceedings of the committee, adopted the resolutions passed by it, and the minutes of this meeting were subsequently signed.

The defendant completed his building in accordance with the amended plans early in 1901. It was admitted that the building was brought forward beyond the front main wall of the adjoining premises of the plaintiff.

Thereupon the plaintiff applied to the corporation, but they declined to move in the matter. The plaintiff now brought this action alleging special damage and claiming a mandatory injunction and costs.

Upjohn, K.C., and McCurdy, for plaintiff.—The written consent of the corporation was not obtained by the defendant. Moreover, the defendant had not only erected a building beyond the building line, which was an indictable offence at common law, but he had also continued the offence after notice, for which a statutory penalty was provided.

They referred to Rumball v. Schmidt, 30 W. R. 949, 8 Q. B. D. 603; and Mayor of Blackpool v. Johnson, [1902] 1 K. B. 646, 50 W. R. Dig. 97.

Butcher, K.C., and Chubb, for defendant.

FARWELL, J.—The plaintiff and defendant in this action describe themselves as burgesses of Loughborough. The plaintiff asks for a declaration that the erection of a stable and coachhouse or building by the defendant is contrary to and in violation of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, and further asks for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to pull it down, and damages and costs. The stable in question was built as long ago as the beginning of 1901 and the writ was not issued until the 23rd of December, 1902. In applications under any ordinary equitable or common law right, it is difficult to see how the plaintiff after such a lapse of time would have any chance of getting a mandatory injunction such as he asks for. This is the first time, as far as I am aware, that any private individual has attempted to assert a private individual right arising out of this clause or any similar clause in the Public Health Act. The question turns on whether the words in section 3 of the Act constitute a general prohibitory clause creating a new offence for which an indictment will lie, or whether they constitute a prohibitory clause specifying only a particular remedy in each case as stated by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wright, 1 Burr. 543. The latter view has hitherto been accepted as the law. Taking now the section of the Act of Parliament without referring to the authorities, the case is reasonably clear. Section 156 of the Public Health Act, 1875, commences by saying "It shall not be lawful in any urban district without the written consent of the urban authority to bring forward any house or building forming part of any street, or any part thereof, beyond the front wall of the house or building on either side thereof, nor to build any addition thereto beyond the front of the house or building on either side of the same. Any person offending against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice on this behalf from the urban authority." Apart from the decisions on the section I should have thought that it was abundantly clear that the offence was the building or erecting or bringing forward of any house or building in any street, without the written consent of the urban authority. That is first of all prohibited, and then "any person offending against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty." This means that he is liable to a penalty for doing the particular act and the only act which is prohibited.

To my mind this section is absolutely clear, and I do not think that there is anything in the two cases which have been referred to that is not consistent with this view. It is impossible, I think, to adopt the plaintiff's construction. It is absurd to say that the Act of Parliament has in one part of a section created an offence without a penalty, and in another part of the same section created a penalty without an offence. Some ordinary rules of draughtmanship are to be assumed to have been followed by the draughtsman. If the two parts are read together, as I understand Grove, J., to say, it seems to me plain that there is an offence to which a penalty is fixed, and it therefore comes within the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield. The first case which is said to be inconsistent with this view is Rumball v. Schmidt. The decision in that case was on the old section 156, but I do not think it really makes any difference. The learned judges there arrived at the conclusion that you can run the two portions together so as to make a kind of compound offence, of the erection and the continuing it, after written notice. The case in the Divisional Court (Mayor, &c., of Blackpool v. Johnson) also seems to me to be inconsistent with the plaintiff's view. I have heard arguments this morning as to the general intent and meaning of the Public Health Act, and it is said that I ought to find here some intention to protect the individual as distinct from the whole of the inhabitants of the borough or district. In my opinion that is not the true view. If the next-door neighbour has any common law rights they are left untouched, and he can assert them. If he has no common law rights, it seems to me that the Legislature under the Public Health Act intended not to create rights in individuals but general rights for the benefit of the inhabitants of a particular borough or district. The very words of this section appear to me to exclude any notion of an individual right because the urban authority is the sole arbiter whether the house shall or shall not be brought forward. If it gives its written consent, the next-door neighbour has no ground of complaint. The urban authority would not have been allowed to override the rights of the individual, had it been intended to create rights in the individual. The intention was to provide for the public health by seeing that the streets were not unduly narrowed and that there was no undue blocking of way or air. It would lead to disastrous results if, when, as in this case, the urban authority refused to interfere, the numerous individuals in a street were allowed to bring their private actions.

On the second point it seems to me that the urban authority had in fact given their consent, seeing that resolutions had been passed approving of the plans of the building, and these resolutions were signed by the mayor and passed and confirmed by the proper officer. When the written consent of the urban authority is spoken of it appears to me that the proper way to testify that consent is by resolutions approving of the particular plans, if those plans do fairly show that which is required. It appears to me to be somewhat extravagant to hold that there must be an express resolution specifying that consent is given to build beyond the front wall of the house on each side. Therefore the action fails and is dismissed with costs.

This was the hearing of an information claiming duty at the rate of 6½ per cent. upon a policy of assurance which became payable at the death of Sir Cuthbert Peek, Bart.

The special case set out the following facts:

On the 25th of July, 1866, Sir Henry William Peek effected a policy for £10,000 in his own name on the life of his son, Cuthbert Edgar Peek (who was born in 1855), to commence at the age of twenty-one years, with the Commercial Union Insurance Co. (Limited). Ten premiums only of £359 17s. 4d. were to be paid, the first on the 25th of July, 1866, and the last on the 25th of July, 1875, all which Sir Henry Peek duly paid.

By the terms of the policy it was declared that the capital stock and funds of the company were liable to pay to the assured £10,000 on proof of the death of Cuthbert Edgar Peek after attaining the age of twenty-one years, and the policy entitled the holder to participate in profits according to the regulations of the company.

In 1884 Cuthbert Edgar Peek was married to Augusta Louisa Brodrick, a daughter of Viscount Middleton, and on the occasion of the marriage he brought into settlement certain property (including the moneys secured by the policy) as his property, and separate settlements of the husband's fortune and the wife's fortune were executed.

The settlement of the property of Cuthbert, which was dated the 2nd of January, 1884, after reciting (inter alia) that Sir Henry Peek was entitled to the policy of assurance in the Commercial Union Insurance Co. for an original sum of £10,000, which with bonuses amounted to a sum of £12,000 or thereabouts, and that upon the treaty for the intended marriage it was agreed that Sir Henry Peek should assign the said policy and the moneys assured by and payable thereunder to the trustees of the settlement, it was witnessed that in pursuance of the agreement and in consideration of the intended marriage Sir Henry Peek, with the approbation of Cuthbert Edgar Peek and Augusta Louisa Brodrick, assigned to the trustees all that the policy on the life of Cuthbert Edgar Peek in the Commercial Union Insurance Co. for the sum of £12,000 and all other moneys assured or to become payable under same. And it was agreed that the policy should be held upon the trusts of the settlement, which trusts included a trust, after the failure of children or issue, in favour of Cuthbert Edgar Peek absolutely.

Cuthbert Edgar Peek (who succeeded to the title on the death of his father on the 26th of August, 1898) died on the 6th of July, 1901. On his death the Commercial Union Insurance paid to the defendants as trustees of the settlement £14,196 17s. in respect of the policy for £10,000 and the bonuses thereon. The Crown claimed that estate duty under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, ss. 1 and 2 (1) (d), or both or either of them, became payable by the defendants on the above sum of £14,196 17s. as "property passing or deemed to pass on the death" of Sir Cuthbert Edgar Peek.

Section 2 of the Finance Act provides as follows: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following—that is to say, (d) Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased."

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—This case is covered by the authority of Attorney-General v. Dobree, 48 W. R. 413, [1900] 1 Q. B. 442, and Attorney-General v. Robinson, [1901] 2 Ir. R. 67. It is admitted that the policy was void under the provisions of 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, but in point of fact the policy was paid, and everyone knew it would be paid, and directly it was paid all the rights and interests under the settlement came into play.

They also cited Worthington v. Curtis, 24 W. R. 228, 1 Ch. D. 419.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendants.—The case here is distinguishable from the two cases quoted by the Attorney-General by the fact, first, that the policy being admittedly void there was nothing that could form the subject of a settlement; and, secondly, that in no point of view was the policy provided by Sir Cuthbert Peek.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., replied.

RIDLEY, J.—I think in this case the Crown is entitled to judgment. I think that the point is practically decided by the two cases quoted by the Attorney-General—namely, Attorney-General v. Dobree and Attorney-General v. Robinson. The distinction that may be drawn between this case and those two decisions seems to me not to be material. It is argued first of all by Mr. Danckwerts that in this instance the policy was one which could not have been enforced by reason of the provisions of 14 Geo. 3 in relation to insurances, but it seems to me that that point is disposed of when you know that the money was paid. It is not a question of whether they had a right to recover it, but a question of whether it was actually paid, and so it was; and, as pointed out by the Attorney-General, it was fully expected it would be so, by all the parties. I do not think that Worthington v. Curtis (the case quoted by the Attorney-General) can be got rid of in the way endeavoured by Mr. Danckwerts. That is a case which shows that when the money is once paid it is subject to all the rights and obligations which attach to it, although at first, and as between the insured and the insurance company, it could not have been recovered.

Now, that being so, it appears to me that this policy-money comes within section 2 (1) (d). I will not stop to consider whether it is also within section 1, for it is not necessary for this decision. I have a suspicion that it might be so, but it certainly appears to me that it comes within section 2, sub-section 1 (d). If the policy had been one upon the life of the deceased, on which he had paid the premium money himself, on which he had paid his own charges, it would have been within sub-section (c); but in this case it is not within that clause because the premiums were paid by the father, Sir Henry Peek, so far as it was necessary that they should be so paid. For this reason it is not within sub-section (c), but it is within sub-section (d), being an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person." It is said that here it is not provided by him because it was the father who took out the insurance and the father who paid the premiums, but although that is perfectly true, when one looks at the settlement one finds that the provision made by that instrument is this—that "in pursuance of the agreement and in consideration of the marriage the said Sir Henry William Peek, as settlor, with the approbation of the said Cuthbert Edgar Peek and Augusta Louisa Brodrick, hereby assigns unto the original trustees," and so forth. Now I cannot help thinking it was quite clear that in the case of a marriage settlement such as the present, where funds are found upon each side—on the bride's side and on the bridegroom's side—if the father provides the money to arise from a policy such as the present with the concurrence and by the approbation of his son, it clearly does fall within the words of this section—namely, that it is "provided by the deceased either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with another person." I cannot help thinking that this does not require any "benevolent" construction, but merely the ordinary reading of those words in the sense which one would attach to them. I do not see any difference that arises between this case and the two former ones, except the distinction which has been drawn by Mr. Danckwerts, and with which I have dealt. I therefore do not go into the general considerations which are covered by the judgment of Palles, C.B. (in the Irish case), and of Channell, J., in Attorney-General v. Dobree. For these reasons I think the duty recoverable.

CHANDLER'S BREWERY CO. (LIMITED) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Housing of the working classes—Compulsory acquisition of lands—Covenant running with land—Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70), s. 21.

By the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, s. 21, wherever the compensation payable in respect of any lands, or of any interest in any lands, proposed to be taken compulsorily in pursuance of the Act requires to be assessed, the estimate of the value of such lands or interests shall be based upon the fair market value as estimated at the time of the valuation being made of such lands.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that a covenant in which a tenant of a brewery company bound himself to take all his beer from the company was a covenant which had to be taken into account in ascertaining the value of the land for the purposes of the Act.

Special case stated under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.

The following facts appeared from the case stated by the arbitrator:

The county council, by the London (Garden-row, Roby-street, Baltic-street, and Honduras-street) Improvement Scheme, 1899, had acquired certain premises in which the brewery company were interested as assignees of a lease dated the 30th of January, 1889, by which the premises known as 2, Middle-row were demised for the term of thirty years from the 25th of December at the yearly rent of £47, subject to certain covenants, which in addition to the usual covenants contained a covenant to use the premises as a beer-house only.

This lease was subsequently assigned to G. C. Porter and William Henry Duseldorf, trading under name of Chandler & Co., and they by an underlease dated the 24th of March, 1897, in consideration of the sum of £800 paid by one Thomas Sorrell, demised the premises to Thomas Sorrell for the term of twenty-two years less ten days from the 25th of December, 1896, at the following rents—viz., first, a yearly rent of £47; secondly, such sums as the lessors might expend in maintaining the insurance of the premises against damage by fire; and, thirdly, the sum of £200 in any and every year in which the lessee, his executors and administrators, should (contrary to the covenant hereinafter contained) directly or indirectly deal with persons other than Chandler & Co., or the persons or person for the time being composing the firm of Chandler & Co. or their successors in business or nominees for any porter, stout, or ale, beer, or other malt liquors which should be sold or disposed of or consumed in or upon the said demised premises . . . and also subject to the covenants in the lease, which covenants in addition to the usual covenants included a covenant that the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, would, during the said term, deal exclusively with the firm of Chandler & Co., their successors and nominees, for all porter, stout, ale, beer, or other malt liquors which should be sold or disposed of or consumed upon the said premises. . . ."

The interest of George Charles Porter and William Henry Duseldorf became vested in the claimants, the Chandler's Wiltshire Brewery Co. (Limited).

It was contended before the arbitrator by the company that they were entitled to the fair market value of their interest in the premises having regard to the existence of the covenant and to the profit they might properly anticipate they would make from the existence of these premises during the continuance of the term; and it was on the other hand, contended by the council that under the terms of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, the company were only entitled to compensation for the loss of their interest in the land acquired, and that the benefit, if any, of the covenant was not an interest in land within the meaning of the Act.

The arbitrator, at the request of the parties, made his award in the alternative, stating the amount to be paid to the company according to whether the existence of the covenant should be taken in consideration or not, and he accordingly determined that if the claimants were entitled to be compensated in respect of the damage sustained by them by reason of the determination of the covenant in the underlease the amount to be paid by the local authority for their interest in the premises was £653, but if the company were not so entitled then the amount was to be ten shillings.

Bray, K.C., and Kisch, for the brewery company.

Cripps, K.C., and Corrie Grant, for the county council.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument: Clegg v. Hands, 38 W. R. 433, 44 Ch. D. 503; Bourne v. Liverpool Corporation, 33 L. J. Q. B. 15, 11 W. R. C. L Dig. 87; and Lord Mayor of Dublin v. Dowling, 6 L. R. Ir. 502, 29 W. R. Dig. 115.

WRIGHT, J.—The question in this case is not at all an easy one to decide as regards the way in which it may work out in detail. It is whether under section 21 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, the value of a covenant tying a public-house is to be considered under the words "whenever the compensation payable in respect of any lands, or of any interests in any lands proposed to be taken compulsorily in pursuance of this part of this Act requires to be assessed, the estimate of the value of such lands or interests shall be based upon the fair market value as estimated at the time of the valuation being made of such lands, and of the several interests in such lands." The question stated in the award is wrong in form, because it describes the question as a question whether damage is to be considered. That is not the right question. It is rather, What is the value of the interest of the claimants in the land? No objection is taken to the award upon that technical ground; therefore I must try and deal with the question of substance. It seems to me that the market value of an interest in land must or may vary according to what covenants do or do not attach. Here the claimants were the assignees of a lease under which they had to pay their superior lord £47 a year. They sublet it as a tied house at the same rental, namely, £47 per annum; therefore they got no benefit from it except the benefit of this tying covenant. When they come to have their interest as assignees of the lease assessed, there is nothing to assess unless the value of this covenant is to be taken into account; and that is really the question which the parties have come here to try, not the way in which it ought to be assessed, if it is to be assessed. An interest such as that of the claimants must, I think, vary in its market value according to what covenants do or do not attach. Here, as I have said, there is no market value apparently, and so the arbitrator has practically found apart from this covenant. But this covenant, according to the authorities, runs with the land, and does, according to the finding of the arbitrator, add some £653 to the value of the interest of the claimants. In many cases I cannot conceive that the covenant running with the land ought not to be taken into consideration in ascertaining the value for the purposes of this Act. Covenants restrictive of building on the same land, or on other neighbouring land, must affect the value of the particular land in question; covenants not to use for trade, and all sorts of other covenants which may be easily imagined, may materially affect the value of the land and of any interest in it. I do not think it is any sufficient answer to point out that the value given by such a covenant as that in question is, or may be, a bare trading value. That is obviously the case, because it may depend on the landlord's trade, or the tenant's trade, or upon many other different circumstances. I do not think that that is enough to enable me to say that the benefit of the covenant is no more than a right to damages. Mr. Cripps admits that the covenant must be taken into consideration to some extent; he was a little unwilling to admit it at first, but I think he was quite right in doing so. Here it is plain on the finding of fact that a man in the market would give more because of the covenant. Obviously he would give nothing for this lease apart from the covenant unless a larger rent than £47 could be got for it from an underlessee. He would give something for the claimant's interest with this covenant attached to it, because he could resell or reassign to the brewers. I cannot see any distinction in law between trade covenants and other covenants, provided that they run with the land. Of course there are many trade covenants which do not run with the land; but when covenants run with the land, as it has been held that this covenant does, I am unable to draw any distinction between them except as regards quantum, which is not in question here. I think, therefore, that the award must be taken as standing with regard to the sum mentioned.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. } March 2.

TWENTYMAN v. TWENTYMAN. (a.)

Divorce—Maintenance—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32.

The Court has no power under section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, to order a lump sum to be paid to the petitioner for maintenance.

Motion upon the registrar's report on a petition for permanent maintenance.

The petitioner and the respondent were married in August, 1900, and a child was born in August, 1901. The marriage was dissolved on the petition of the wife on the ground of the husband's cruelty and adultery and a decree absolute was pronounced on the 10th of November, 1902.

A petition for maintenance was then filed under section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, in answer to which the husband stated that his income amounted to £443 per annum and no more.

The registrar reported that the respondent was possessed of certain securities, the market value of which amounted on the 30th of January, 1903, to £23,578, considered together with a leasehold house and furniture valued at about £625 Some of the securities, whose estimated value was about £5,304, produced no income at all. The registrar recommended that a sum of £8,000 should be realized by sale of securities and assigned to trustees of a deed to be settled by one of the conveyancing counsel of the court in trust to pay the income arising therefrom to the petitioner for her life for the maintenance of herself and child, and on her death for the benefit of the said child.

The petitioner moved to confirm the registrar's report with an amendment that £100 of the £8,000 therein mentioned should be paid to the petitioner in cash. The respondent moved that the report should be varied by reducing the sum of £8,000 to £4,000, and by ordering that the sum of £4,000 or £8,000 should be paid to trustees on trust to pay the income to the petitioner during her life, and upon her death in trust to pay the capital to the respondent, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

Cannot, for the petitioner.—Morris v. Morris, 31 L. J. P. & M. 33, 10 W. R. P. & D. Dig. 24, is an authority that a lump sum may be awarded by way of maintenance. It has been followed in Stanley v. Stanley, 47 W. R. 272, [1898] P. 227; Kirk v. Kirk, [1902] P. 145, 50 W. R. Dig. 145.

Barnard, for the respondent.—Section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, gives no power to the court to give a lump sum of money absolutely. It can only make an order for an annual sum secured upon the property of the respondent or give a gross sum secured upon the property. The question of allowance for the child does not come in at all. That is conferred by section 35, which places the children of a marriage that has been dissolved on the same footing as children of a marriage the parties to which have been only judicially separated. Neither does section 45 give power, but deals only with the property of a guilty wife. The court should not do more than give security for the income of the £8,000 for the petitioner's life.

Cannot, in reply.—The respondent has no business and his capital is diminishing year by year. He has, moreover, threatened to leave the country. The court should therefore grant an injunction restraining him from parting with his property: Newton v. Newton, 34 W. R. 123, 11 P. D. 11.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said: This case raises the question which I must now determine, whether the court has power to carry out the recommendation in the registrar's report, and I am sorry to have to come to the conclusion that the court has not that power. It was contended that the words in section 32, "such gross sum of money," are not governed by the subsequent words, "not exceeding her own life," and that these words apply only to the security. If that was so I should think it would be in the power of the court to impose on a petitioner the obligation of settling such gross sum as the respondent might be ordered to pay. But I cannot so read the section, and I am led to the view I now hold in spite of the steps, which of course it is not my business to regard, as to how those words came to be inserted, by the observation that that applies both to the gross and to the annual sum of money mentioned in the section. With regard to the annual sum of money it must be clearly a securing by settlement in the ordinary way; and when a gross sum is ordered, that must also be secured and not paid over to the petitioner, and it can only be secured for some period not exceeding the lifetime of the petitioner. I have now come to the clear conclusion, after hearing this point raised and argued for the first time, that the court has no power under section 32 to order a lump sum down by way of permanent maintenance.

This decision may seem a departure from those given in Morris v. Morris, Kirk v. Kirk, and also to a certain extent from Stanley v. Stanley, but in neither of those cases does the point seem to have been raised by the counsel for the respondent, and in one at least the order for a lump sum was made by consent. I say this because, from the report of Morris v. Morris, I observed there was an offer by X., the respondent, to pay a sum of £1,000, and I cannot help thinking that the Judge Ordinary was influenced by that. But however that may be, it certainly was not contended in Morris v. Morris that the gift of a lump sum could not be made absolutely to the petitioner, and so the point which I have been called upon to decide to-day was not raised. In Kirk v. Kirk Barnes, J., had only the case of Morris v. Morris before him, and he ordered a lump sum of £6,000 to be paid by the respondent to the petitioner without any opposition on the part of the respondent or anybody. In Stanley v. Stanley, where the court was dealing with very small means, Barnes, J., also followed the case of Morris v. Morris, and ordered payment of a lump sum.

But notwithstanding those decisions, having regard to the plain words of the Act and to the fact that the point has now been definitely raised and argued for the first time, I cannot say that I have power to make the order asked, although I should have been glad if I could have seen my way to do so. Section 35, moreover, does not give me the requisite power, though but for a direct decision of Hannen, P.—viz., Hunt v. Hunt, 31 W. R. 724, 8 P. D. 161—I should have thought that the words were wide enough. With all respect to that decision, the words do not appear to me to be limited. The case appears, however, to be exactly in point, and is binding on me. There was in that case a sum of £1,400 available for purposes of settlement. The court was asked that some part of that sum should be set aside for the children, and the point was taken that the court had no jurisdiction to make such an order, that section 35 only gave a general power to make provision for children's maintenance after decree, and that if the Legislature had intended to give the court authority to order a sum to be secured for the children it would have used express language for the purpose, as in section 32. Hannen, P., thereupon said, "I am of opinion that I have no power to make the order asked for," and he rejected the motion accordingly. The order which I make in the present case is, that the sum of £8,000, which appears to be a proper sum under all the circumstances, should be realized and should be secured by the respondent for the petitioner for her life by a proper deed to be prepared by the conveyancing counsel of the court. Any allowance for the child must be the subject of a separate application. There remains only the question of an injunction. Although I do not wish to express any formal opinion against the respondent, I think that I should accede to the request of the petitioner in ordering that he be restrained from parting or dealing with his property in any way which might hinder the security for the £8,000 being completed in the way I have ordered. With regard to the petitioner's request that £100 should be paid to her out of the £8,000, I think that £100 should be paid to her at once on account of income.

REEVE v. LISLE AND OTHERS. (a)

Mortgage—Redemption—Independent agreement—Once a mortgage always a mortgage—Option to lender to enter into partnership—Sale or mortgage.

Where mortgagor and mortgagee entered into an arrangement dealing with the equity of redemption of certain property and making certain terms as to a possible partnership,

Held, that as the arrangement was subsequent and independent of the mortgage, and that as there was nothing unconscionable or unfair in the transaction, the agreement was binding.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, 50 W. R. 231, [1902] 1 Ch. 53, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., 50 W. R. 231, [1902] 1 Ch. 53), where the facts are set out at length.

For the purposes of this report the following short statement will suffice:

In 1898 the respondents advanced to the appellant £5,000 upon the security of a ship and other property, under an agreement made between them on the 23rd of April, 1896, whereby the money was not to be called in or paid for two years, and the respondents might elect to enter the partnership within the two years, upon the terms of releasing the mortgage debt, and the ship and other property becoming partnership assets.

Later on, in July, 1898, another agreement was entered into between the parties. It recited the agreement of 1896, that the respondents had not entered into partnership; that the respondents had applied for, but appellant was unable to pay, the £5,000, and had requested the respondents to extend the term for a further period of five years; and it was thereby agreed (1) that the respondents might within five years elect to enter into partnership with the appellant; (2) that the respondents should in that event release the appellant from payment of the £5,000 and transfer the mortgage property for the purposes of the partnership; (3) that the capital of the partnership property should belong to appellant and respondents in equal shares.

In February, 1900, the respondents exercised their option, and communicated to the appellant their intention to enter into partnership with him, but he refused, alleging that the effect of the agreement was to render the property irredeemable and that it was an illegal clog on the equity of redemption.

The Court of Appeal held that the agreement of July, 1898, was binding, being an independent and subsequent arrangement to the original mortgage. This affirmed the decision of Buckley, J. (49 W. R. 188), but on different grounds.

Warmington, K.C., and Martelli, for the appellant.

Astbury, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—Notwithstanding the gallant effort that has been made by Mr. Warmington and his learned junior in this case, it appears to me that it does come back to that which the Court of Appeal suggested, and without quarrelling with or attempting to throw any doubt upon the propositions of law which have been advanced in this case, it seems to me that the Court of Appeal has taken the right view of the facts. When I say upon the facts, I am speaking now of the facts as elicited by the documents themselves, though in respect of one of them it is perfectly clear, by the limited admission that is now made, that there was a mistake in reference to the question of the policy.

Then the question which your lordships have to determine is whether or not this second transaction of 1898 was or was not the same transaction in the sense in which those words are used by the learned counsel for the appellant.

The view of the Court of Appeal, who had all the facts before them (and I do not propose to question the view which they have taken of these documents read together), is this, that the later transaction was entirely separate—that it was, in truth, a matter applicable to the contemplated partnership, and that the real position of the parties was this, that all the securities were already in their possession; that this further transaction altered the rate of interest, but that the real substance of the second transaction was the contemplated partnership. Under these circumstances it was a mere question of what inference ought properly to be drawn from the nature of the instruments, and the object and purpose with which they had been entered into, as well as what the documents contained themselves. I come to the conclusion that what has been called here, and, I think, accurately called, the question of fact between the parties, was rightly arrived at by the Court of Appeal; and, if that is so, there is not and cannot be any question as to the law which ought to prevail in this case.

Under these circumstances, I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion, and I take the same view of the facts that the Court of Appeal did. Notwithstanding the very able argument addressed to us by Mr. Warmington to prove that the purpose of this document was the consolidation and rearrangement of the mortgages, in my opinion it was nothing of the kind. The respondents had the benefit of all these securities. There was merely a stipulation introduced at the request of the appellant, who was asking for time. Not being prepared to pay the money, he said, "If you will give me five years, you shall have the whole of that time in which to determine whether to enter into the partnership or not." When the respondents did make up their minds to enter into the partnership the appellant turned round and said: "Oh, but this transaction is entirely wrong; it strikes at the root of an equitable doctrine, and I am not bound by it." I think on the facts, as we have them before us, he is bound by it, and must pay damages for having broken his agreement.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord LINDLEY.—I also am of the same opinion. Mr. Warmington's argument is necessarily based upon the blunder in the recital in the deed of July, 1898, which is all wrong. In point of fact the real transaction was not taking a mortgage security for £5,000, or getting a better security than they had. It was not that at all. The real transaction was that the mortgagees were bargaining for a share in the partnership on certain terms. By a blunder in the recital they have given a foundation for a very ingenious argument to which I am happy to say we are not bound to accede. I have no doubt the decision is perfectly right, and the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

In an action in the Mayor's Court to recover a sum of £40 the plaintiff recovered judgment, and the judge who tried the action gave a certificate, under rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890, awarding the plaintiff costs on the scale applicable where £50 or over was recovered. The solicitor, who acted for the defendant in the action, delivered to the defendant a bill of costs, which included his costs of the action in the Mayor's Court and also costs in other matters, such as conveyancing, in which he had acted for the defendant. The defendant obtained a common order to tax the bill in the High Court, and the master taxed that part of the bill which related to the costs of the action in the Mayor's Court upon the scale where £50 or over was claimed.

Held, that the effect of the order of the judge of the Mayor's Court was to take the action for all purposes out of the lower scale and to place it in the higher scale, and that, therefore, the taxing-master was right.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers.

An action was brought in the Mayor's Court against Messrs. Tewson, Son, & Meeks to recover a sum of £40, and the plaintiff in that action recovered judgment for that amount. The judge who tried the action gave a certificate under rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890, awarding the plaintiff costs upon the scale applicable where the amount recovered was £50 or over.

In this action Messrs. Briggs & Son acted as solicitors for the defendants, Messrs. Tewson, Son, & Meeks, and they had also acted for them in other matters relating to conveyancing, &c. Messrs. Briggs & Son delivered to their clients, Messrs. Tewson, Son, & Meeks, a general bill of costs, which included their costs of the action in the Mayor's Court. The clients obtained a common order in the High Court to tax the bill under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. The master taxed that part of the bill which related to the costs of the action in the Mayor's Court on the scale applicable to cases where £50 or over was claimed. The clients carried in objections to the taxation, upon the ground that "the amount claimed was under £50, and that the costs should therefore be taxed upon the scale applicable to that amount, notwithstanding that the judge upon the trial made an order for costs as between party and party on the higher scale. By the express words of rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules, 1890, the power of the judge to give costs on the higher scale is limited to awarding such costs to the 'party recovering' (which is not this case) or the party 'successfully defending' (which is not this case), and there is no other power whatever enabling the taxing-master to allow the costs of the solicitor as against his client upon the higher scale except where the amount claimed or recovered in fact exceeds £50. Rule 10 of order 65 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Rules has no application except to the scales set out in the appendix to those rules, and cannot cover the Mayor's Court scales." The master in his answer to the objections stated that an order was made in the action for costs as between party and party to be taxed on the higher scale, and such an order must, in his opinion, also apply to the costs as between the parties and their own solicitors. He accordingly refused to review his taxation. Phillimore, J., refused to order the taxing-master to review the taxation.

Messrs. Tewson, Son, & Meeks appealed.

By rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890: "It shall be in the power of the judge of the court to award costs on a higher scale to the plaintiff on any amount recovered, however small, or to the defendant who successfully defends an action brought for any amount, however small, provided the said judge certify that the action involved some novel or difficult point of law, or that the question litigated was of importance to some class or body of persons, or of general or public interest."

J. B. Matthews, for the appellants.—As between party and party the appellants were, in consequence of the order of the judge in the Mayor's Court, bound to pay costs upon the higher scale. But rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890, gave the judge no power to award costs on the higher scale as between the litigant and his own solicitor. The taxing-master was therefore bound to tax according to the scale applicable where the amount claimed was under £50. Rule 1 provides that in every action or matter in the Mayor's Court all costs shall be taxed by the registrar according to the scales. That applies to a taxation in the High Court of costs incurred in a Mayor's Court action. Rule 13 is similar in its terms to section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

J. B. Matthews replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Phillimore, J., refusing to direct the master to review the taxation of a bill of costs. The question arises between an unsuccessful defendant and his solicitor in respect of the costs of an action in the Mayor's Court. At the trial the judge of the Mayor's Court, under rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890, ordered that the plaintiff should recover costs upon the scale applicable where £50 or over was recovered. The defendants' solicitor sent in his bill of costs as against his own clients, and, as I understand, the costs of the action in the Mayor's Court constituted only a comparatively small part of the total bill of costs. The clients obtained a common order in the High Court to tax the bill, and the master taxed the costs of the Mayor's Court action upon the scale applicable where £50 or over was claimed. The learned judge at chambers affirmed the taxation.

It is contended on behalf of the clients that that decision is wrong upon the ground that the scale of costs applicable depends upon the amount claimed, and that they ought not to lose that advantage because the judge at the trial certified for costs to be paid to the plaintiff on the higher scale. The judge gave his certificate under rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules, and, in my opinion, the effect of the certificate is, so far as costs are concerned, to take the whole case out of the lower scale, and to justify anyone who has to deal with the case in treating it as one in which the costs are not to be measured by the amount claimed, but as one which, on account of its importance, is brought within the higher scale. The taxing-master was right, therefore, in dealing with the case as one in which the claim was for a sum of £50 or over, unless there is some limitation or prohibition in the rules which prevents his taxing the costs on that scale. It is admitted that there is no express limitation or prohibition. The only rule that can be pointed to is rule 1, which provides that "in every action or matter in the Mayor's Court all costs shall be taxed by the registrar of such court according to the scales of fees and costs set out in the schedules hereto annexed, subject to the review of such taxation by one of the judges of the court." But in that very system of rules comes rule 13, which gives power to the judge to lift the action out of one scale and to place it in another, and we shall be giving full effect to the rules by saying that the order of the judge raises the case for all purposes out of one scale into another, and makes the higher scale the standard of taxation applicable to the case in all its parts. The decision of the learned judge, affirming the taxation of the master, is right and must be affirmed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As was pointed out early in the argument, the effect of the order of the judge who tried the case was to raise the case into the class of cases where £50 or over is claimed or recovered, as the case may be. That order, which was made as between party and party, ought reasonably to be extended to the taxation of costs as between solicitor and client, because it may be reasonably assumed that as, by reason of the difficulty or importance of the case, extra labour was entailed on the plaintiff, it is probable that extra trouble and skill were required on the part of the defendants' solicitor. The taxing-master seems to me to have acted entirely in the spirit of the judge's order at the trial by treating the action as one in which £50 or over was claimed.

Appeal by the General Steam Navigation Co. from an award of the judge of the Southwark County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

On the 24th of September, 1902, the applicant for compensation, who was in the employment of the appellants, was employed on board their steamship Nautilus. The Nautilus was lying in the River Thames, moored in the fairway. She was discharging a cargo of steel and iron plates into lighters alongside by means of her own cranes. Access to the ship for the workmen was by boat. The applicant was one of a gang of eight men engaged in the main hold unloading the ship. While they were so engaged some of the steel plates fell on the applicant's leg, with the result that his leg had to be amputated.

Upon proceedings being taken to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was admitted on behalf of the applicant that before the Factory and Workship Act. 1901, which repealed the prior Factory and Workshop Acts, the applicant would not have been entitled to compensation; but it was contended that the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, must now be taken, by reason of section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1889, as referring to section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.

By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a . . . factory . . ." By sub-section 2, "'factory' has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. . . ." By section 23, sub-section 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, certain provisions of the Factory and Workshop Acts were to have effect as if "(a) Every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process . . . were included in the word factory. . . ."

Section 23 of that Act is now repealed by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and section 104 of the Act of 1901, has replaced section 23, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1895. By section 104, sub-section 1, "The provisions of this Act with respect to (i.) power to make orders as to dangerous machines (section 17); (ii.) accidents; (iii.) regulations for dangerous trades; (iv.) powers of inspectors (section 119); (v.) fines in case of death or injury (section 136), shall have effect as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and all machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal were included in the word 'factory,' and the purpose for which the machinery or plant is used were a manufacturing process. . . ." By sub-section 2, "For the purposes of this section . . . the expression 'ship' and 'harbour' have the same meaning as in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," which, by section 742, defines "harbour" as including navigable rivers.

By section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1889, "where this Act or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provisions of a former Act, references in any other Act to the provisions so repealed shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provisions so re-enacted."

The county court judge held that by force of the Interpretation Act, 1889, the word "factory" now includes machinery used in the process of unloading any ship in any "harbour," which includes a navigable river; and he accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant for 17s. 6d. a week during incapacity.

The employers appealed.

Carver, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the employers.—It is admitted on behalf of the applicant that if the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, is still applicable no right to compensation is given, because the machinery referred to in section 23 of that Act is machinery used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse. The machinery in the present case was being used for unloading into lighters in the river, and would not therefore come within the Act of 1895: Hennessey v. McCabe, 48 W. R. 231, [1900] 1 Q. B. 491; Raine v. Jobson, 49 W. R. 705, [1901] A. C. 404. Section 23 of the Act of 1895 has, however, been repealed by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and section 104, sub-section 1, of this latter Act enacts that certain provisions of that Act shall have effect as if all machinery used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal were included in the word "factory." It is admitted that if that section is to be read into the definition of "factory" in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge is right; but it is submitted that it is not to be read in. The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, does not incorporate the Factory Acts. It only refers to them as defining the subject-matters covered by the Act of 1897. The effect is the same as if the words of the then existing Factory Acts had been written into the Act of 1897: Reg v. Smith, 21 W. R. 382, L. R. 8 Q. B. 146. The reference in the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897 to section 23 of the Factory Act, 1895, only incorporates the particular words of that section. Section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1889, does not make that reference a reference to the subsequent Factory Act, 1901. Section 104 of the Act of 1901 is not a repeal "with modification" of section 23, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1895. The later Act has extended very considerably the scope of the former Factory Acts, and the word "modification" does not include an extension of an Act. Section 104 is entirely new and extended legislation and cannot be called a "modification" of the earlier Act.

Thorn Drury and W. Valentine Ball, for the applicant, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—I fail to see anything in the point taken on behalf of the appellants. The express words in section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1899, conclude the question. That section provides that "where this Act or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act repeals and re-enacts with or without modification any provisions of a former Act, references in any other Act to the provisions so repealed shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provisions so re-enacted." We have a general Act—the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901—which repeals and re-enacts with modifications the former Factory and Workshop Acts. Unless it can be said that the provision in section 104 of the Act of 1901, which includes in the word "factory" "all machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal," cannot be described as a "modification" of the repealed section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, then it is conceded that the effect of section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, is to incorporate the provision so modified into the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That reduces the question to this: Is the introduction of the words "harbour, &c." into section 104 of the Act of 1901 such a radical alteration and extension of the former section as not to come within the word "modification" in section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889. I do not think that it is. It is a modification by the addition of certain words.

The ship here was being unloaded in the river, and not in a dock, and therefore it seems that before the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the employment of the applicant while unloading the ship in the river would not have come within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. But the modification abovementioned was introduced into section 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and, having regard to the terms of that modification, I can have no doubt that the object of its introduction was to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The Legislature must be taken to have been fully aware of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and of the decisions thereon, and in making this alteration in the Factory Act they must have intended to alter the Workmen's Compensation Act. I have no doubt that the alteration was introduced in view of the difficulties which had been discovered in the former legislation, and that the alteration was introduced with full knowledge of section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1889, which enabled the Legislature in this way to modify the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, though the Factory Acts to which express reference was made in the Act of 1897 were repealed. I can see no reason for limiting the word "modification" in the Act of 1889 to a narrowing of the repealed Act and for not applying it to an extension of the Act. The appeal therefore fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that the machinery used in unloading this ship is not such machinery as is specified in section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and would not therefore have come within the definition of "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. But section 23 of the Act of 1895 has been repealed, and in lieu thereof a similar section has been re-enacted in the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901—section 104, which brings within the definition of "factory" all machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal. It is admitted that the machinery in the present case falls within the class of machinery referred to in that section. What is the effect of that? By section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1889, where any Act passed after the commencement of that Act repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provisions of a former Act, references in any other Act to the provisions so repealed shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provisions so re-enacted. We have in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, a reference to the provisions of the Act of 1895. That reference is to be construed as a reference to the provisions re-enacted, whether with or without modification. It is not suggested that any contrary intention appears. The re-enacted provisions need not be identical with the repealed provisions. The sole question is whether, when the modification takes the form of extending and not narrowing the limits of the Act, it is a "modification" within the meaning of section 38, sub-section 1, of the Interpretation Act, 1889. I can see no reason for holding otherwise. It seems to me that section 104 of the Act of 1901 is a re-enactment with a modification of section 23 of the Factory Act, 1895, within the meaning of section 38, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1889.

Appeal by the plaintiffs against a decision of Phillimore, J., in favour of the Crown on a case stated.

The case set out the following facts:

The plaintiffs were the annuity trustees under the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Purchase Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxxxviii.), and they sought to recover from the defendant two sums of £8,122 10s. 8d. and £9,611 6s. 6d. respectively, which had been deducted by the defendants, as income tax payable by the plaintiffs in respect of two sums which the plaintiffs alleged were instalments of the purchase price of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, and as such were not chargeable with income tax.

The East India Co. on the 17th of August, 1849, entered into a contract with the railway company whereby they acquired the option of purchasing the undertaking of the company without being compelled to pay the purchase price down in one capital sum, by means of annuities to be reckoned from the time when the gross amount would be payable.

By the Government of India Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 106) the territories of the East India Co. were vested in the Crown, and the Secretary of State exercised the powers that were formerly exercised by the company or board of control.

In August, 1899, the Secretary of State, acting in pursuance of the provisions of the contract of the 17th of August, 1849, gave notice of his intention to purchase the railway and works at a price of £34,859,217, and further gave notice to pay by way of annuities instead of the gross sum. The rate of interest was fixed at £2 17s. per cent., payable half-yearly.

By section 12 of the Great Indian Annuities Railway Act, 1900, these annuities were payable to the plaintiffs, and they as the annuity trustees divided the holders of the annuities into two classes. Class A were those annuitants who had elected to receive their annuities in full; class B those who had elected to have their annuities paid with a sum deducted for a sinking fund, which at the end of forty-eight years would amount to the principal sum.

On the 1st of January, 1901, a payment of £634,254 became due to the annuity trustees in respect of the annuity. Part of that sum—viz., £162,450, was in fact a payment on account and as part of the capital sum of £34,859,217, the ascertained amount of the full purchase-money, and the residue thereof was a payment in respect of interest on that capital sum for the six months immediately preceding; and the subsequent sums paid in respect of the annuity were composed partly of capital and the balance of interest on the amount of the purchase-money for the time being remaining unpaid.

The Secretary of State for India deducted income-tax on the whole sum of £634,254.

The income tax on £162,450, which represented a payment of capital, amounted to £8,122.

On the 1st of July, 1901, the next payment became due, and the Secretary of State for India again deducted income tax upon the whole amount.

The income tax on so much of the amount as represented capital was £9,611.

The plaintiffs claimed the two sums of £8,122 and £9,611, and a declaration that the Secretary of State was not entitled to make any deduction from future half-yearly payments in respect of such part of such payments as were payment on account of and as part of the capital sum of £34,859,217.

Phillimore, J., held that income tax was payable upon the whole amount of each half-yearly payment and not merely upon so much of it as represented interest. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cripps, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and T. T. Paine, for the plaintiffs.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the defendant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In our judgment this appeal ought to succeed. I assent to a great deal that the Attorney-General has said about annuities, but it seemed to me that the outcome of his argument left him in this position: He could not say that every annual sum which was payable under a contract was necessarily an annuity within the income tax Acts. This had really to be admitted, in any case where it appeared upon the face of the contract that there was a debt existing independently of the contract which gave rise to the annual payment —if the annuity or annual payment was on the face of the contract of such a nature that you could say, on reading the contract, "This is not a contract for the purchase of an annuity, it is a contract under which a debt is made payable by instalments"—that the income tax would not apply in such a case to the whole sum payable by such annual instalments. It is not denied but that the income tax Acts would apply and income tax be payable in respect of so much of the annual payment as was not a repayment of an instalment of the antecedent debt. It was not denied, and is not denied in the present case, that income tax is payable upon so much of this annual sum, the annual instalment of purchase-money payable by the Indian Government, as consists of interest. The whole question in this case is: Is income tax payable upon that portion of the annual payment which you can discover from the very terms of the contract is a mere payment of an instalment necessary to complete the payment of an existing debt? In my judgment no income tax is payable in such a case.

Now when I come to look at the clauses in this contract—clauses 22, 23, and 26—it seems to me perfectly obvious that there having come into existence a debt payable by the Indian Government for the purchase of this railway, the Indian Government having the option, if they chose, to pay off this debt by annual payments—annual instalments—instead of paying down the gross sum, the Indian Government elected so to do; and that this annual payment (called in this contract an annuity) is really merely the payment of the purchase-money of the railway by annual instalments plus interest. In my opinion there is no tax payable in respect of this annual payment in so far as it is an instalment of a repayment of the principal of a present debt. I think under those circumstances the judgment of Phillimore, J., was wrong and that he ought to have given judgment in favour of Sir Andrew Scoble and the other persons.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The East India Co. gave notice to exercise the option of paying an annuity. The sum which was left to be paid was large, amounting to over £34,000,000, and obviously it was a very great advantage to a government, which does not generally possess capital but exists by income alone, to have the payment of that sum provided for by moderate annual payments of capital and of income, and accordingly that course has been adopted. The question which we have got to decide is whether in these circumstances the income tax is payable on the full amount of each instalment or only upon so much of it as represents income. Now the case of Foley v. Fletcher, 7 W. R. 141, 3 H. & N. 769, has been much referred to, and is relied on on both sides. It seems to me that the principle that is laid down in that case with reference to the construction of the word "annuity" has never been departed from. I think all the learned judges who gave judgment in that case say the same thing. For instance, Pollock, C.B., says this, "If we were at liberty to speculate on the matter and could come to the conclusion that a part of the annual payments is the price of the convenience of getting the payment postponed we could not say that the payments are within the Act because part of them consists of profits. These instalments are payments of money due as capital. The Act has made no provision for such case. It professes to charge profits only, and we cannot say that capital is liable to the income tax because found in company with profits." And Bramwell, B., says: "By an Act for granting to her Majesty duties on profits arising from property, professions, trade and offices it cannot be taken that the Legislature meant to impose a duty on that which is not profit derived from property, but the price of it." And similar observations are made by Watson and Channell, BB. True it is that there are found observations in the judgments which seem to point in an opposite direction; for example, that which has been most relied on is what is said by the Lord Chief Baron in the close of his judgment: "If the plaintiff had sold the estate for an annuity, so calling it, the annuity would have been liable to income tax. But she sold it for a sum which is payable by instalments, which is therefore not chargeable." Now as to that portion of the judgment, it has not been followed. We have express authority in the case of The Nizam's Guaranteed State Railway Co. v. Wyatt, 24 Q. B. D. 548, 38 W. R. Dig. 88, of the Divisional Court, for saying that the mere fact that a sum is designated as an annuity is not conclusive, but that the real nature of the transaction must be looked at. Now if we look at the real nature of the transaction here, the so-called annuities are merely annual payments of equal amount, being instalments of a debt, and are made up partly of principal, partly of interest calculated at a particular rate. On the face of the contract, therefore, it appears that each annual instalment contains principal money and a portion of interest which can be readily ascertained by a competent actuary. Therefore in that state of things we are right in following the principle which I take to be laid down in Foley v. Fletcher, that the word "annuity" under those circumstances is not to be read in such a way as to make capital taxable.

Now the difficulty which I certainly felt in the present case arises from this: that it is said (and forcibly said) by the Attorney-General that that being so, then in the case of every terminable annuity which has been purchased for value, the same thing occurs, and you ought, if you logically follow out the principle, to say that each annual payment of that annuity ought to be split up between capital and interest and only the portion which represents interest ought to be taxed. I feel the full force of that remark, but it seems to me that the cases are not the same. There are cases of purchase of annuities where investment has been made in the form of property, and the Legislature in so many words has said that that is to be taxed, and it is recognized in this very case throughout that an annuity of that kind is taxable. And I in no way depart from that. The case to which I have referred seems to me to show that is a different matter where it appears on the face of the transaction that the so-called annuity is not a thing of that kind, but simply represents instalments of an existing debt. It matters not whether the debt be one which is a purchase arising from a sale, or whether it be the case of a repayment of a loan, in which latter case it is admitted by the Attorney-General that it is not the practice to tax anything except so much of the annual instalments as represent interest.

For these reasons I am unable to agree with Phillimore, J., and I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the instalments stipulated for under this contract are not payments of an annuity within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. "Annuity" in the ordinary sense of the expression means the purchase of an income. It generally involves the conversion of capital into income, and reasonably enough, where the buyer places himself in that position, the Act of Parliament taxes him. He is taken at his word. He has got an income secured in the way I have mentioned. Now, has such a case any analogy whatever to the present? It appears to me none. Here was a sum of money, a lump sum, stipulated for in the first instance, which was to represent the capital outlay. If that money had been handed over to those who were entitled to it, it might have been invested, ought to have been invested, and probably would have been invested, and if invested the income would be taxable and not the principal sum. Now that sum representing the capital outlay is, by the terms of the contract, a sum that may be paid off by what is called (unfortunately) in the contract an annuity. It really means by annual instalments. Was it intended that under the contract those to whom the money was to be payable were to be in a worse position and to get less than if the other alternative were adopted by the Government? I cannot think there was any such intention. The option to pay in that way was one that was exercised independently of any consent of those to whom the money was payable. I think it was intended from the way that the sums were arrived at under the contract, whether they were paid by annual instalments or by a lump sum, that those who were entitled to it should not pay income tax. I quite agree that the case of Foley v. Fletcher, so far as it has not been encroached upon and impaired by the subsequent decision to which our attention has been called, is an ample authority for what I cannot help feeling is the perfectly reasonable conclusion to which we are invited to come in this case. I agree the appeal must be allowed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TRUSTEES OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM. (a.)

Treasure-trove—Crown—Prerogative—Charter—Franchise.

In 1896, in the course of ploughing a field near the shore of Lough Foyle, certain gold articles, all lying together in a space of about nine inches, were discovered at a depth of about eighteen inches beneath the surface of the field. The articles, which were probably made between A.D. 200 and A.D. 400, were of considerable value and of a miscellaneous description, including a model of a boat and a hollow collar, inside of which were concealed several plaited chains. The articles were purchased privately by the Trustees of the British Museum.

On a claim by the Crown for delivery up of the articles as being treasure-trove,

Held, (1) that the true inference to be drawn from the above circumstances was that the articles were originally intentionally concealed for the purpose of security, and, therefore, were, primâ facie, treasure-trove; (2) that the onus lay upon the defendants to adduce satisfactory evidence to displace this primâ facie inference, and that the defendants had failed to do so.

Held, further, that a grant by charter from the Crown of lands together with all "franchises" did not by the word "franchises" pass the right to treasure-trove.

This was an information by the Attorney-General against the trustees of the British Museum, to establish the title of the Crown to certain gold articles as treasure-trove.

The articles were found in 1896, in the course of ploughing a field belonging to a Mr. Gibson near Limavady, on the shores of Lough Foyle.

The articles lay altogether in a space of about nine inches at a depth of about eighteen inches from the surface of the field. They were of considerable value, and of a miscellaneous description, including the model of a curragh, and a hollow collar, inside which were placed several plaited chain necklaces. The articles were sold by Mr. Gibson to a jeweller, and purchased from him by Mr. Robert Day, who sold them by private treaty to the British Museum for £600.

The land where the articles were discovered was included in a charter of 1662, whereby the Crown granted certain lands to the Irish Society, together with various rights, including "franchises."

Sir R. Finlay, A.G. Sir E. Carson, S.G., Sutton, and R. J. Parker, appeared for the Crown.—The fact that all the articles were found close together in a narrow space primâ facie shows that they had been placed there for concealment; they therefore come within the definition of treasure-trove (3 Coke's Inst., 132). The onus lies on the defendants to displace that primâ facie inference. The terms of the charters granted by the Crown to the Irish Society were not such that the right to treasure-trove thereby passed to the grantees. The right to treasure-trove is a prerogative of the Crown, and can only pass by words of express grant.

They referred to Chitty on Prerogative of the Crown, 391, 392; Plowden, 243, 336; Bann Fishery case, Davys' Irish Reports, 149, 156; Comyn's Digest, vol. 7, Prerogative, 74; The Abbot of Strata

Warmington, K.C., Haldane, K.C., and E. Beaumont, for the trustees of the British Museum. — These articles are not treasure-trove. There is evidence to show that they were a votive offering to some Irish sea god. The locus in quo is what is known to geologists as "raised beach," and in ancient times was covered by the sea. Stephen's Commentaries, 3rd ed., vol. 2, Book IV., Part I., p. 530, states the meaning of treasure-trove. Again, the grant by charters from the Crown to the Irish Society was intended to pass treasure-trove. The grant comprised the lands in which these articles were found, and the terms of the grant included all "franchises." The British Museum have acquired by assignment whatever rights the Irish Society or their mesne assignees were entitled to, so far as these articles are concerned.

They referred to Dyke v. Walford, 5, Moo. P. C. 434; Attorney-General of Ontario v. Mercer, 8 App. Cas. 767, 32 W. R. Dig. 33; Attorney-General v. Moore, 41 W. R. 294, [1893] 1 Ch. 676; Cruise's Dig. III., 244.

The nature of the evidence adduced at the hearing of the case on behalf of the defendants is summarized in the judgment.

June 20.—FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: In the year 1896 two ploughmen were driving a furrow in a field near Lough Foyle, the leader with a 6in. plough, the second, Nichol, following down the same furrow with a 14in. American plough. Nichol's plough struck something hard at the bottom of the furrow, and he stopped and went back and found certain gold articles all lying together in a space about 9in. square. The articles found consisted of the following: (1) A hollow collar with repoussé ornaments; (2) a model boat with thwarts, and a number of oars, spars, &c.; (3) a bowl with four small rings at the edges; (4) a solid gold torque; (5) one half of a similar torque; (6) a necklace consisting of three plaited chains with fastening; (7) a single chain. The two last were found inside the hollow collar. The oars were much bent, and were inside the bowl, which was flattened. The boat was crumpled up. Nichol took the articles to his master, and they were sent to the factory of Messrs. Johnson in Grafton-street, Dublin, who restored them to the shape in which they have been shown to the court. They are articles of great interest and beauty, of Celtic origin. The dates suggested for their manufacture range from 300 B.C. to 600 or 700 A.D. I think that they may fairly be attributed to the second or third century after Christ. Ultimately they were purchased by the trustees of the British Museum, and they are now claimed by the Crown as treasure-trove.

The trustees set up two defences—first, they deny that the articles are treasure-trove; and, secondly, if they are, they allege that by a charter of Charles II. the right to treasure-trove is vested, not in the Crown or themselves, but in the Irish Society. Several definitions of treasure-trove have been cited to me, not substantially differing one from another. I will take that cited in Chitty on Prerogative, p. 152: "Treasure-trove is where any gold or silver in coin, plate, or bullion, is found concealed in a house, or in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown, in which case the treasure belongs to the king or his grantee, having the franchise of treasure-trove; but if he that laid it be known or afterwards discovered, the owner and not the king is entitled to it; this prerogative right only applying in the absence of an owner to claim the property. If the owner, instead of hiding the treasure, casually lost it or purposely parted with it, in such a manner that it is evident he intended to abandon the property altogether and did not propose to resume it on another occasion, as if he threw it on the ground or other public place or in the sea, the first finder is entitled to the property, as against every one but the owner, and the king's prerogative does not in this respect obtain. So that it is the hiding, and not the abandonment, of the property that entitles the king to it." It is clear from the very terms of the definition that no direct evidence can be given of the intention to hide, or the intention to abandon, by a person who is ex hypothesi unknown. The direct evidence must necessarily be confined to the discovery of articles in fact concealed, and the court must presume the intention to hide or to abandon from the relevant surrounding circumstances, and the motives that usually influence persons acting under such circumstances, according to the ordinary dictates of human nature.

In the present case the articles were obviously of considerable value, but of a miscellaneous nature, such as might well represent the store of a native chief or the spoils gathered in the raid of some Norse pirate. The articles were all put close together, the chains being actually concealed within the hollow of the collar in the mode which a person hiding them for safety, with a view of returning to reclaim them, would be likely to adopt. Their value renders it improbable that they would be abandoned except under stress of imminent danger, and the care with which the chains were put inside the collar and all the articles were collected together point to the absence of any such imminent danger as would necessitate abandonment. The inference, therefore, is that they were intentionally concealed for the purpose of security. There is no evidence at all as to the date of concealment, but the state of Ulster from the beginning of its history down to comparatively modern times has been such as to render it highly probable that treasure would have been concealed on many occasions, and in this very district there is record of a great invasion of Norsemen, who overran the land comprising this spot about the year 850 A.D. The inference, therefore, appears irresistible that this was vetus depositio, unless the defendants can displace it. Mr. Warmington argued that it would be enough for him to show any other plausible theory. I do not agree with him. The Crown must first prove a primâ facie case, but when the Crown has done so, the defendants can only defeat that title by producing a better title. But, in my opinion, the defendants' theory is not even plausible. I desire to speak with all respect of the gentlemen who have been called as witnesses for the defence, but I must express my opinion that the court has been occupied for a considerable time in listening to fanciful suggestions more suited to the poem of a Celtic bard than the prose of an English law reporter. The defendants' suggestion is that the articles were thrown into the sea, which, they suggest, then covered the spot in question, as a votive offering by some Irish sea king or chief to some Irish sea god at some period between 300 B.C. and 700 A.D.; and for this purpose they ask the court to infer the existence of the sea on the spot in question, the existence of an Irish sea god, the existence of a custom to make votive offerings in Ireland—during the period suggested, and the existence of kings or chiefs who would be likely to make such votive offerings. The whole of their evidence on these points (if I may so describe it) is of the vaguest description.

I find as follows: (1) There is no evidence to show that the sea ever flowed over the spot in question within any period during which the articles could have been in existence; it is not disputed that the raised beach on which the spot is situate is of later origin by upheaval than the surrounding land, but there is nothing to show that it was raised at any time since the Iron Age began; and so far as I can see, it may have been at any time between 2000 or so B.C. and some time before the beginning of the Christian Era. (2) There is nothing to show that votive offerings of the sort suggested were ever made in Ireland. There is no such consensus of expert opinion as would enable me to find that such offerings have ever been made in Europe since the Bronze Age. There is no case known of a votive offering anywhere of a ship coupled with other miscellaneous articles, and there is no case on record of any votive offering having ever been made in Ireland at any time. (3) Notwithstanding the passage in Brash's work on Ogham inscriptions in Ireland which has been cited to me, it is by no means certain that there was any Irish sea god at all. (4) Or that there were any Irish sea kings or chiefs who made offerings to a sea god, if any such god there were. Further, the negative inferences against the defendants' theory are of considerable weight. Votive offerings to a pagan deity would be offered in such a way as to make the most display; no one seeking to propitiate an anthropomorphic deity, who like Baal might be engaged in hunting or sleeping, would be likely to conceal two of his gifts in the hollow of a third; nor (as pointed out by Mr. Coffey in his evidence on behalf of the Crown) would the donor mutilate some only of the objects as the defendants here allege to be the case. Mutilation would either be essential, or an insult, and one would expect, therefore, to find all or none mutilated. Again, by virtue of what process have all these articles of such different sizes, weights, and shapes been kept together during all these years under the whelming tide? What magic bag had the Irish sea king which would withstand the action of the waves until the ornaments confided to its care found a safe resting-place in the soil formed on the surface of the beach when the sea receded? It was perhaps natural that the defendants should grasp at theories which, in justice to them, I may say were not invented for the purpose of this defence; but it is really little short of extravagant to ask the court to assume the existence of a votive offering of a sort hitherto unknown in a land where such offerings were hitherto unknown, in a sea not known to have existed for 2,000, and possibly 4,000 years, to a sea god by a chieftain both equally unknown: and to prefer this to the commonplace but natural inference that these articles were a hoard hidden for safety in a land disturbed by frequent raids, and forgotten by reason of the death or slavery of the depositor. It is perhaps hardly necessary to mention that my observations as to votive offerings are confined to votive offerings of the character suggested by the defendants, and have nothing to do with votive offerings in Christian churches, or with offerings to wells and fountains, of which many instances are collected in Brand's Popular Antiquities, vol. 2, p. 259 and onwards. The view that I have expressed on the facts renders it unnecessary for me to express any opinion on the Attorney-General's further point that votive offerings may be treasure-trove.

The defendants' next point is this: They say that the right to treasure-trove was granted by a charter of King Charles II. to the Irish Society, and that the Crown has, therefore, no title. The first part of this defence depends on the construction of the charter. In 1613 King James I. granted a charter to the Irish Society for the purpose of effectuating the settlement of Ulster. In 1638 this charter was cancelled, and in 1662 the existing charter was granted for the purpose of restoring all the property and rights created by the charter of James I. Counsel agree that the two charters are practically identical, and it is necessary to refer, therefore, to the later charter only. The material parts of the charter, it is sufficient to say, contain a grant of lands and rights couched in a multiplicity of words, including waived chattels, estrays, and franchises, but not mentioning treasure-trove or royalties; the appointment of the society as vice-admirals of the coast, with all royalties, &c., to the office appertaining; and the grant of wreck, flotsam, and jetsam. It is argued that treasure-trove has passed under the word "franchises" either by the general meaning of the word or by its meaning as used in this particular document. In my opinion that contention fails. A franchise is a Royal privilege or branch of the King's prerogative subsisting in a subject by a grant from the King (Chitty on Prerogatives, p. 119). So long as it is attached to the Crown it is called prerogative, but when granted to a subject it is called franchise (Chitty on Prerogatives, p. 118). For the present purpose franchises may be divided into two classes—those which the King has in his own hands as parcel of the flowers of his Crown, and those which have no existence until created by the King. See the case of the Abbot of Strata Marcella, 9 Coke 25*b*: "It is to be known that when the King grants any privileges, liberties, or franchises, &c., which were privileges, liberties, or franchises in his own hands, as parcel of the flowers of his Crown, as bona et catalla felonum, fugitivorum, utlagatorum, &c., bona et catalla waviata, extrahur', deodanda wreccum maris, &c., within such possessions, there if they come again to the King they are merged in the Crown and he has them again in jure coronae; and if the wreck or goods waifed, estrays, &c., were appendant before to possessions, now the appendancy is extinct and the King is seised of then in jure coronae. But when a privilege, liberty, franchise, or jurisdiction was at the beginning enacted and created by the King and was not any such flower before in the garland of the Crown, there by the accession of them again to the Crown they are not extinct nor the appendancy of them severed from the possessions; as if a fair, market, hundred, leet, park, warren, et similia, are appendants to manors, or in gross, and afterwards they come back to the King, they remain as they were before in esse not merged in the Crown, for they were at first created and newly enacted by the King and were not in esse before, and time and usage has made them appendant." This distinction is well settled and was recognized in the case of The Duke of Northumberland v. Houghton. Franchises which belong to the King by right of his prerogative cannot pass under the general word "franchise" in a grant from the Crown, because they do not exist as such; until created by grant they are part of the prerogative. If created and resumed they merge in the prerogative. But franchises which are no part of the flowers of the Crown have no existence until the Crown expressly creates them, and these, if resumed, do not merge—e.g., the right to felons' goods is in the Crown, and can be exercised simply by virtue of the prerogative; the right to a fair or market has no existence until the Crown has created it, so that although the Crown could create a fair or market with tolls by charter, it could not enforce payment of tolls as for a fair or market by virtue of the prerogative without first creating the fair or market with tolls. It is of course clear that treasure-trove belongs to the Crown by virtue of the prerogative. Indeed, it is one of the instances given by Mr. Ellis in his argument in Dyke v. Walford, adopted by Lord Selborne and the Privy Council in Attorney-General of Ontario v. Mercer, 8 App. Cas., at pp. 778 and 779. Nor is the word "franchises" superfluous in the charter of Charles II. It would refer, and may well have been intended to refer, to those franchises of the second class which if created would remain appendant to the property in respect of which they were created or in gross, as the case may be. Further, when the Crown desired to grant any of these flowers of the Crown they were expressly mentioned—e.g., waived chattels and outlaws, and wreck, flotsam and jetsam. The true inference is that treasure-trove would have been also specified if it was intended to grant it. The same argument to some extent applies to the word "royalties." Mr. Warmington argued that the word "royalties" would be sufficient to pass these flowers of the Crown on the authority of Dyke v. Walford cited above. The Attorney-General does not admit this, and I express no opinion on the point; but if it would, the fact that the only royalties granted were those that belong to the office of vice-admiral raises a strong presumption that none other were intended to pass. I have arrived at the conclusion that treasure-trove does not pass by this charter by applying the ordinary rules of construction so far as is compatible with the subject-matter of the grant; and it is therefore unnecessary for me to express any opinion on the contention of the Attorney-General as to the rules by which the Crown is entitled to have its grants construed.

It is also unnecessary for me to express any opinion on the last point urged by the Attorney-General, which is of considerable general importance—viz., that in all claims to property the Crown is entitled to treat the defendant as if he were plaintiff, and to insist that he must succeed on the strength of his own title and cannot defeat the Crown merely by showing that the Crown's title is bad.

The result is that I will make a declaration that the articles in question are treasure-trove belonging to his Majesty by virtue of the prerogative royal, and I order the delivery up of the same accordingly.

STEVENS v. THEATRES (LIMITED) AND OTHERS. (a.)

A mortgagee obtained a foreclosure order nisi against the mortgagor. Before this order was made absolute the mortgagee sold under his power of sale.

Held, that the foreclosure order nisi did not extinguish the power of sale, but suspended the right to exercise it without the leave of the court.

On the 20th of February, 1896, the defendants, Theatres (Limited), mortgaged the Royalty Theatre and adjoining premises to the plaintiff, George Stevens, to secure £3,000 and interest.

On the 26th of November, 1897, in an action by the plaintiff against Theatres (Limited), a foreclosure order nisi was made in the usual form, but the taking of the account was not proceeded with.

On the 3rd of December, 1897, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendants that he proposed to sell the properties comprised in his security, and on the 23rd of February, 1898, the plaintiff assigned the premises to A. Drucker.

On the 3rd of August, 1899, Drucker assigned the premises to the defendant, Miss Kate Santley.

On the 23rd of August, 1901, A. Drucker was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on the 11th of August, 1902, it was ordered that the names of Mr. Drucker's trustee in bankruptcy and of Miss Santley should be added as defendants in this action.

On the 20th of February, 1903, Miss Santley moved that all proceedings might be stayed as against her, and it was then arranged that the case should be argued on the following point of law:

Whether, assuming that, apart from the order of the 26th of November, 1897, the plaintiff Stevens had by virtue of the mortgage of the 20th of February, 1896, a power of sale exercisable on the 17th of December, 1897, he was prevented from exercising such power by reason of the existence of the order of the 26th of November, 1897."

The case now came before the court to be argued on this point of law.

Upjohn, K.C., and à Beckett Terrell, for Miss Santley, referred to Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 30 W. R. 553, 6 Q. B. D. 345, 7 App. Cas. 235, and Wrixon v. Vize, 3 Dr. & War. 104.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Coldridge, for Stevens.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and George Wallace, for Theatres (Limited).

H. E. Wright, for the trustee in bankruptcy.

FARWELL, J., said that, having regard to the fact that Miss Santley was a purchaser for value without notice, the answer to the point of law raised must be qualified. The question whether the decree for foreclosure nisi operated to prevent the exercise of the mortgagee's power of sale had to be decided on principle, in the absence of authority. Neither the mortgagee nor the mortgagor was entitled to dismiss the action of their own motion: Taylor v. Mostyn, 32 W. R. 256, 25 Ch. D. 48; Exchange and Hop Warehouses (Limited) v. Association of Land Financiers, 35 W. R. 120, 34 Ch. D. 195. So far as the judgment operated, the plaintiff could not get rid of it, nor could he vary the judgment in any way by putting it out of his power to obey the order of the court, without leave of the court.

The mortgagee had an absolute title at law, but the mortgagor had the right to redeem, and the court equally regarded the rights of both. The power of sale in a mortgage was a modern invention, and possibly for that reason no authority could be found on this point. The power of sale could not be exercised without the leave of the court after the foreclosure order nisi was made. Did the order of the court extinguish the power of sale? In his opinion it did not. The order foreclosure nisi did not destroy the power of sale, because the remedies of the mortgagee were only suspended for a particular purpose. It could not be said that the power of sale was gone. It was a question of some importance to purchasers, because the purchaser might find the power of sale extinguished. If in this case the mortgagee had come to court he might have had leave to exercise the power of sale. The result was that the mortgagee could not exercise his power of sale without the consent of the court, but that the power of sale was not extinguished.

In re FITZGERALD. (a.)
SURMAN v. FITZGERALD.

Conflict of laws—Scotch law—Scotch marriage contract made in Scotland—Lex loci—Life interest by way of alimentary provision—Inalienable life interest in domiciled Englishman—Fraud upon creditors—Public policy

By a Scotch marriage contract a domiciled Scotchwoman settled property (including what by the law of Scotland is for certain purposes deemed to be Scotch real estate) upon trust (among other purposes) to pay the income to F., her intended husband, a domiciled Englishman, for his life, and the contract contained a declaration "that all payments to the said F. should be strictly alimentary, and should not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors." The trustees of the settlement were English, and the trusts had been administered in England. F. had purported to charge his life estate.

Held, that even if the construction and effect of the contract was to be determined by Scotch law, yet its validity and operation must be governed by the law of England, and that an inalienable life estate to a man being contrary and repugnant to the public policy of English law, F. was not entitled to payment of the income as against his incumbrancers.

This was a summons by the trustees of settlements made in 1862, raising in effect the question whether under the circumstances mentioned below certain mortgagees had or had not a valid charge upon the life interest of Sir Gerald Fitzgerald under a settlement in Scotch form.

In 1862 a marriage was contemplated between Sir Gerald Fitzgerald, who was domiciled in England, and the lady who afterwards became Lady Fitzgerald, and who was domiciled in Scotland.

By an English settlement made in consideration of the intended marriage and dated the 20th of September, 1862, but executed in Scotland, certain property was assigned to trustees upon trust for Sir G. Fitzgerald for life, with remainder to Lady Fitzgerald for life, and after the death of the survivor upon the trusts therein declared for the children of the marriage.

By a Scotch marriage contract of even date with the English settlement, and made between the intending husband of the one part and the intending wife of the other part, and reciting the English settlement, Lady Fitzgerald assigned to the same trustees all her then present and future property upon trust (in effect) to pay the costs of the trust, and subject thereto to pay the income to Lady Fitzgerald for life, and subject thereto in case Sir G. Fitzgerald should survive his wife to pay the said income to him during the remainder of his life, and it was by the contract declared "that all payments to the said Sir Gerald should be strictly alimentary and should not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors"; and subject thereto upon the trusts therein declared for the children of the marriage.

The marriage was duly solemnized and there was issue one child and no more—viz., Miss Geraldine Fitzgerald, who was born in 1863.

Lady Fitzgerald died on the 16th of May, 1901.

Prior to this date Sir G. Fitzgerald and Miss Fitzgerald had executed numerous documents purporting to charge their respective interests under the English settlement and the Scotch contract, some of these having been executed prior to Miss Fitzgerald's attaining twenty-one on the 19th of June, 1884, and others subsequently to that event.

The trust had always been administered in England, and five of the six trustees were domiciled in England.

The question above indicated, which now came up for argument, depended in substance upon the question whether the Scotch contract was to be construed, with respect to its validity, according to Scotch or English law. If according to the former, then Sir Gerald's life interest was (except in favour of alimentary creditors and to the extent required by such creditors) restrained from anticipation, and the charges given as above mentioned were invalid.

The trust funds under the Scotch contract comprised (inter alia) Scotch heritable bonds, which, it was contended, were by the law of Scotland treated as real estate.

E. Ford, for the plaintiffs, the trustees.

Hughes, K.C., and Philpotts, for Sir G. Fitzgerald.—As to the real property, if heritable bonds are to be deemed realty the Scotch law must govern, but whether the property is movable or immovable Scotch law is the proper criterion according to the obvious intention of the parties. If the question arises as to which of two systems of law is to govern a contract, and that contract contains provisions which are obnoxious to one system, the parties must be deemed to have intended to be governed by the other system; if not, their own acts would be stultified: Barnard v. White, 56 L. T. Rep. 9, 35 W. R. Dig. 177; Chamberlain v. Napier, 29 W. R. 194, 15 Ch. D. 614; and In re Missouri Steamship Co., 37 W. R. 696, 42 Ch. D. 321. This was simply a bargain for value between husband and wife.

Younger, K.C., and Crossman, for the daughter, adopted similar arguments.

Badcock, K.C., and Methold, for the first mortgagee of the life interest.—No doubt persons may intend expressly or impliedly that the law of a particular country shall apply to their contract; but if the forum of jurisdiction becomes an English forum then only in so far as such law is not repugnant to English law, to that extent the English courts, by the comity of nations, will give effect to the intention; here the provision is void according to English law.

Hamilton, K.C., and Vernon C. James, Ashworth James, Blakesley, Withers, Northcote, and Pepys appeared for other incumbrancers.

JOYCE, J., in a reserved judgment, stated the facts and the questions at issue, and continued: Now, it is contended that the words in question in the Scotch contract preclude Sir G. Fitzgerald from assigning so as to create a valid incumbrance. The domicil and residence of Sir G. Fitzgerald has throughout remained English, and the trustees are all subject to and have indeed invoked the jurisdiction of the English courts; in those circumstances it appears to me that even if the construction and effect of the contract in question is to be determined by Scotch law (Barnard v. White) yet its validity and operation with respect to the matter now in question must be determined by the law of England: see Westlake on International Law, p. 76; Vaizey on Settlements, 1640, et seq. Moreover, if the question were one solely of contract between the parties, yet a contract inconsistent with the law and policy of this country, or which conflicts with what are treated in England as essential public interests could not be enforced in England: Westlake, 259. According to English law an inalienable trust in favour of a man, even for his maintenance, is not allowed, nor is a mere prohibition against alienation effectual except with regard to a married woman's separate estate: Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. 429; Graves v. Dolphin, 1 Sim. 66; Younghusband v. Gisborne, 1 Coll. 400. It is contrary to English public policy, as being a fraud upon creditors, that property should be so settled as to continue in the enjoyment of a bankrupt notwithstanding bankruptcy. The words, therefore, in the Scotch contract in question are void and inoperative according to English law, being repugnant and contrary to public policy. It is clear that in so far as the property comprised in the contract is personalty, the law of England must govern, and upon reflection, having regard to the frame of the settlement, I think there is no difference even with regard to that part (if any) which ought by the law of Scotland to be treated as real and immovable property. Sir G. Fitzgerald had merely a personal claim against the trustees to be paid the income subject to the costs of the trust, and I think that the decision of the House of Lords in Scott v. Allnutt, 2 Dow & Clark, 404, at p. 409, applies (see also Noell v. Robinson, 2 Ventris 353). I therefore hold that the assignees and incumbrancers under the several documents of charge, and not Sir G. Fitzgerald, are the persons entitled to receive the income from the trustees of the Scotch contract.

Summons.

By articles of settlement dated the 27th of January, 1845, upon the marriage of Sir Robert Walpole and Miss Gertrude Ford, certain railway shares and sums of Consols were settled upon trust for Sir Robert Walpole for life, with remainder for Lady Walpole for life, with remainder for the children of the marriage as Sir Robert should appoint, and in default of appointment by him, as Lady Walpole should appoint, and in default of any appointment for the children equally.

There were nine children—namely, R. E. Walpole (who died in 1867), George Walpole (who died in 1872), Geraldine Walpole, Spencer C. Walpole, Mary Walpole, Emma Walpole (who died in 1882), William H. Walpole, Catherine Walpole, and Margaret Walpole.

Sir Robert Walpole died on the 12th of July, 1876, having appointed certain specific sums of Consols to his daughter Geraldine, but not having further exercised his power of appointment.

On the 18th of November, 1879, Lady Walpole, by deed-poll, appointed that the trustees of the settled funds should, after her decease stand possessed of the trust funds (other than the Consols already appointed to Geraldine Walpole) for the other six then surviving children in equal shares absolutely.

On the 29th of September, 1893, a settlement was executed in contemplation of the marriage then intended and afterwards solemnized between one of the said children, William H. Walpole, and Miss Minnie Thompson, by which, after reciting that under or by virtue of the articles of 1845 and the deed-poll of 1879 W. H. Walpole was entitled in reversion expectant on the decease of Lady Walpole to one-sixth part or share of the trust funds then subject to the trusts of the articles of 1845, W. H. Walpole assigned to trustees on the usual trusts for himself and his wife and the children of the marriage this one-sixth part or share "and all other (if any) his estate and interest of and in all other the trust moneys, funds, stocks, shares, and securities for the time being subject to the trusts of" the articles of 1845.

By her will, dated the 22nd of January, 1875, Mrs. Sophia Frances Berens, a sister of Sir Robert Walpole, had bequeathed to Sir Robert Walpole certain leasehold premises in London and some specified chattels; and by a codicil dated the 23rd of December, 1878 (after his death), she directed that the amount of property left by her will to him should be paid to the trustees of Lady Walpole's marriage settlement and be held on the trusts thereof. Mrs. Berens died on the 8th of February, 1900, and her will and codicil were proved on the 13th of March, 1900; and on the 24th of March, 1900, her executor assigned the said leasehold premises to the trustees of the articles of 1845, by whom they had since been sold and the proceeds invested.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a deed of declaration and appointment dated the 23rd of July, 1900, to which Lady Walpole and her surviving children and the representatives of deceased children were parties, after reciting that doubts had arisen as to whether the leasehold premises and other property bequeathed by Mrs. Berens were comprised in the appointment contained in the deed-poll of the 18th of November, 1879, it was agreed and declared that they should be deemed not to be comprised therein or in any way affected by such deed-poll, and that Lady Walpole's power of appointment should as regarded them be deemed not to have been exercised, but to be then capable of being exercised; and Lady Walpole thereby irrevocably appointed that from and after her decease and subject to her life interest the leasehold premises and other property, bequeathed by Mrs. Berens, or the property for the time being representing the same, should be held in trust for Spencer C. Walpole, Mary Walpole, William H. Walpole, Catherine Walpole, and Margaret Walpole, their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, in equal shares.

In November, 1900, W. H. Walpole charged his one-fifth share and interest or other his share and interest under the deed of the 23rd of July, 1900, of and in the leasehold premises and other property bequeathed by Mrs. Berens, or the property for the time being representing the same, in favour of his sister, Mary Walpole, as security for a loan of £600 and interest at 4 per cent., and he subsequently gave her a further charge on the same property to secure a further advance of £100.

W. H. Walpole died on the 31st of January, 1902, leaving a will, of which he appointed Spencer C. Walpole executor.

On the 22nd of November, 1902, an originating summons was taken out by one of the trustees of W. H. Walpole's marriage settlement, to which Spencer C. Walpole (who was also the other trustee of the settlement) and Mary Walpole were made defendants, for the determination of the question whether upon the true construction of the settlement the trustees thereof were entitled (subject to Lady Walpole's life interest) to W. H. Walpole's share of and in leasehold premises and other property bequeathed by Mrs. Berens or the property for the time being representing the same, or whether such share, subject to Lady Walpole's life interest and to the incumbrances in favour of Mary Walpole, constituted part of W. H. Walpole's estate.

H. B. Howard, for the plaintiff.—The settled property, at the period of distribution is caught by the words in W. E. Walpole's marriage settlement, whatever be its character at that period. By that settlement there is an assignment of Mr. Walpole's share in any property that comes into the hands of the trustees of the articles of 1845. It may be said that the investments representing the leasehold house are not included because the property was in form of leaseholds at the date of the appointment of July, 1900; but this would give no effect to the words "for the time being." It was a wasting security, and the trustees were bound to sell it.

Ashton Cross, for the defendants.—To construe the words "all his estate and interest" as a covenant to settle is to strain their meaning. They are merely inserted to ensure that nothing in what is settled is omitted; and there is nothing in these words which can bring in after-acquired property. Present estates and interests only are referred to.

March 14.—JOYCE, J., delivered a written judgment in which, after stating the facts, he continued: Probably it is not necessary to decide whether the effect of Mrs. Berens' codicil was to make the property thereby bequeathed to the trustees of the marriage articles of 1845 a fund to be added and treated in all respects as an accretion to the funds originally settled, as in Eustace v. Robinson, 7 L. R. Ir. 83, 29 W. R. Dig. 239, or to create another settlement with referential trusts, as in In re North, 76 L. T. Rep. 186, where Stirling, L.J. (then Stirling, J.), held that by a bequest of property to the trustees of a settlement upon the same trusts there was not an accretion to the trust funds of the settlement, but a settlement with referential trusts of an independent fund. It appears to me, however, that, even if Lady Walpole could by the deed of 1879 have exercised with respect to the property which the trustees of the marriage articles took by the codicil of Mrs. Berens, in 1900, the limited and fiduciary power of appointment which she had under the marriage articles of 1845 before such power was created in reference to that property (see Farwell on Powers, 2nd ed., p. 226, and In re Hayes, Turnbull v. Hayes, 49 W. R. 659, [1901] 2 Ch. 529), this appointment by her in 1879, according to the true construction thereof, did not purport and was not intended to operate and did not operate as an appointment of any moneys, shares, stocks, funds, or securities not then already subject to the trust of the marriage articles. Mrs. Berens did not direct the property by her codicil bequeathed to the trustees of the marriage articles to be held upon the trusts thereof and of any appointment then already made in exercise of the power of appointment therein contained. Such codicil does not in any way refer to the appointment of 1879, or to the marriage settlement of W. H. Walpole. Now, what W. H. Walpole assigned to the trustees of his marriage settlement of 1893 was his one-sixth share under the appointment of 1879 in the stocks specified in the first schedule to such marriage settlement, and all other (if any) his estate and interest of and in all other the trust moneys, funds, stocks, and securities for the time being subject to the trusts of the marriage articles of 1845. If I am right, he did not by the appointment of 1879 acquire any share or interest in the property subsequently bequeathed by Mrs. Berens. Further, in my opinion, the assignment contained in his marriage settlement passed only such estate and interest as he then had. It neither was nor purported to be a contract to assign any interest he might afterwards acquire by appointment (Sweetapple v. Horlock, 27 W. R. 865, 11 Ch. D. 745; Lovett v. Lovett, 46 W. R. 105, [1898] 1 Ch. 82; and per Stirling, L.J., in Attorney-General v. Selborne, 50 W. R. 210, [1902] 1 K. B. 388, at p. 398); or, indeed, either by appointment or otherwise, in any property not then subject to the trust of the marriage articles, as, for instance, that afterwards bequeathed by Mrs Berens to the trustees of such articles upon the trusts thereof. And this bequest probably did not operate to make the property bequeathed an accretion to the funds originally settled by the marriage articles, but merely created a new referential settlement of such property upon similar trusts. At all events, I hold that the assignment by W. H. Walpole in his marriage settlement of all (if any) his estate and interest and in all other the trust moneys, funds, stocks, shares, and securities for the time being subject to the trusts of the marriage articles of 1845, did not comprise or affect any share or interest which subsequently came to him by the appointment of 1900 in the leasehold premises or other property bequeathed by the codicil to the will of Mrs. Berens.

MOURMAND AND ANOTHER v. LE CLAIR. PROVINCIAL UNION BANK, CLAIMANTS. (a.)

Bill of sale—Sums repayable by instalments—Denomination of money in monthly payments omitted—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9—Form in schedule, Deviation from—Validity.

A bill of sale, given to secure the repayment of an advance of £70 and interest at the rate of 1*s. per month, stated that the grantor agreed to pay to the grantee "the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by monthly instalments of seven* (sic) on the 25*th day of every month succeeding the date of these presents."*

The Court was of opinion that an irresistible inference arose from the language of the instrument that the missing word was "pounds."

Held, therefore, that the bill of sale was valid, as being substantially in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act.

Appeal by the claimants, the Provincial Union Bank, from a decision of the judge of the Greenwich County Court in an interpleader issue in which he held that a bill of sale granted by the defendant to the claimants was void as not complying with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

The material part of the bill of sale was as follows: "The grantor doth hereby assign unto the grantee and his assigns all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule hereto annexed by way of security for the payment of the sum of £70 and interest thereon at the rate of 1s. in the £ per month. And the grantor doth further agree and declare that he will pay to the grantee the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by monthly payments of seven (sic) on the 25th day of every month succeeding the date of these presents, the first payment to be made on the 25th day of September next."

Herbert Reed, K.C. (T. E. Haydon with him), for the claimants.—The omission to specify in words the denomination of the money to which the word "seven" refers does not invalidate the bill of sale. It is perfectly clear that the word omitted could not be anything but "pounds," and that the parties intended the repayment to be by monthly payments of seven pounds each on a certain named day in every month. The instrument states that the interest was to be at the rate of 1s. in the £ per month, and therefore it is inconceivable that the agreement as to repayment was that the grantor should repay the principal sum and interest at the nominal rate only of 7s. per month. This is a business document, and the court is justified in construing it to give to the words used the obvious and ordinary meaning which business men would apply to them.

He cited Grannell v. Monck, 24 L. R. Ir. 241, 37 W. R. Dig. 24, and Coles v. Hulme, 8 B. & C. 568.

F. O. Robinson, for the execution creditor.—The county court judge rightly held that the bill of sale was void under section 9 of the Act of 1882 on the ground that it was not in accordance with the form in the schedule. The authorities show that that provision must be construed strictly, and that it is not complied with if some material part of the form is omitted, although the omission may be of such a nature that at common law it would not make the instrument invalid. The object of the Legislature was that the borrower should understand the nature of the security, and that a creditor on merely searching the register should be able to ascertain the borrower's position: Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R. 353, 13 App. Cas 506; Davis v. Burton, 32 W. R. 423 11 Q. B. D. 537. This bill of sale does not fulfil either object, because it is impossible to ascertain from its language the amount of the monthly instalments. The omission cannot be supplied by extrinsic evidence, though the defect could be cured if it could be inferred beyond all doubt from the language of the bill of sale what the amount of the instalments was intended to be: Parsons v. Brand, 38 W. R. 388, 25 Q. B. D. 110; Bird v. Davey, 39 W. R. 40, [1891] 1 Q. B. 29. No such inference can be drawn here. It may be admitted that the missing word is not shillings or guineas, but it does not necessarily follow that it must be pounds. The language of the instrument is consistent with an intention that the instalments should be at the rate of seven "shillings in the pound per month." Such a method of repayment, though possibly unusual, would be valid, because it would only require a simple arithmetical calculation to ascertain the amount of each monthly instalment and the date by which the principal sum would be paid off: Linfoot v. Pockett, 44 W. R. 66, [1895] 2 Ch. 835. The cases cited for the appellant are not in point. Coles v. Hulme was not a decision under the Bill of Sales Act. Grannell v. Monck was decided on very different facts from the present, and, further, being an Irish case, is not binding on this court.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case it seems to me that the learned county court judge has been misled by the rules laid down in the cases as to the effect of section 9 of the Bill of Sales Act, 1882, which provides that a bill of sale shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule. The question which we have to decide is whether this bill of sale is in accordance with the form to the Act. I agree that in order to decide the question the bill of sale only, ought to be looked at, and that external circumstances ought not to be taken into consideration. Mr. Robinson for the execution creditor argued that the bill of sale was void as not complying with the form in the schedule, and he cited a passage from Thomas v. Kelly, 13 App. Cas., at p. 520, per Lord Macnaghten, who said that in order to be in accordance with the form, a bill of sale must not "depart from the statutory form in anything which is a characteristic of that form." It was suggested by him that the language of the sentence in the bill of sale which dealt with the amount to be paid by the grantor was capable of meaning a sum other than pounds; and he argued that the true grammatical reading of the words was "7s. in the pound per month." If I thought that there was any reasonable doubt as to the amount denoted by the word "seven," I should agree with Mr. Robinson's contention; but when it is observed that the amount of interest was £3 10s., it seems to me unreasonable to suggest that any sum of money could have been intended to be paid other than a sum which would be expressed in pounds. With regard to the contention that the words might mean 7s. in the pound per month, looking at the amount of the principal sum and the fact that interest was being charged, I think that meaning could not reasonably be given to the words.

Therefore in my opinion the learned judge was wrong in holding that this bill of sale was not substantially in accordance with the schedule of the Act and this appeal must be allowed.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN GOUGH AND THE ASPATRIA, SILLOTH, AND DISTRICT JOINT WATER BOARD. (a.)

Waterworks—Lands compulsorily taken—Special adaptability of site.

An arbitrator, in assessing the value of lands taken for the purposes of a reservoir, may award an extra value in respect of the special adaptability of the site for the purposes of a reservoir even though it cannot be proved that there are other competitors for the site.

Special case stated by the umpire.

By the Aspatria, Silloth, and District Water Act, 1901, the Aspatria, Silloth, and District Water Board was constituted for the purpose of constructing the works and taking the waters by the said Act authorized and for supplying water within the districts and parishes therein mentioned, and exercising the powers in the said Act contained.

On the 14th of October, 1901, Miss Gough was served with a notice to treat for certain lands and water therein referred to, of which she was owner, for the purpose of making a reservoir.

Arbitrators and an umpire were appointed for the purpose of assessing the amount due to her, and at the request of the parties the umpire stated his award in the form of a special case. One of the findings in the special case was that "owing to the natural configuration of such last-mentioned lands such lands are peculiarly adaptable for the construction of a reservoir."

One of the questions for the opinion of the court was whether in estimating the value of the land to be acquired by the water board for the Overwater and Chapel House reservoirs, respectively, the natural and peculiar adaptability for the construction of a reservoir of the land in question is a fit and proper matter for consideration in the value thereof in the assessment of compensation. If the court should be of opinion that the natural and peculiar adaptability for the construction of a reservoir of the lands in question is not a fit and proper matter for consideration as an element in the value thereof in the assessment of compensation, then the umpire reduced the amount of his award by the sum of £1,686 *

Balfour Browne and Roskill, for the water board.—The arbitrator was wrong in taking the special adaptability of the lands into consideration. There must be some commercial value in order to get compensation for special adaptability. There must either be some other town who would be likely to purchase the land for the purpose of constructing a reservoir, or there must at least be evidence to show that it is adaptable for other places, and here it is only shown that the land had special adaptability for the purpose of supplying the board.

They cited Countess Ossalinsky v. Manchester Local Board, reported in appendix to Browne and Allan's Law of Compensation, 1896, p. 718.

Sir Ralph Littler, K.C., and W. Gorst Clay, for the claimant, were not called upon upon this point.

WRIGHT, J., after dealing with the other parts of the case, said: As regards the question as to the £1,636 awarded in respect of the special value of this site, I do not see my way to interfere with the award on this point. It seems to me that if there is a site which has peculiar natural advantages for the supply of water to a particular valley or to a particular area of any other kind, or to all valleys and areas within a certain distance if those valleys are what might be called natural customers for water by reason of their populousness and of their situation, if the site has peculiar natural advantages for the supply of water in that sense, apart from value created or enhanced by any Act of Parliament or scheme for appropriating the water to a particular local authority, I think it ought to be taken that there is a natural value in the site for the purposes of water supply, and that it should be taken into consideration. It would be otherwise, of course, if there was no natural value in the place as a water site apart from the particular Act or scheme of the promoters; or, in other words, there is no value for which compensation ought to be given under this head if the value is created by the Act or scheme of the promoters. But I cannot think I am bound to hold that there is no special adaptability value merely because it is impossible to put one's hand upon people who can compete for the site. I think the existence of an area which would naturally require the use of water ought to be sufficient, and I do not think that any decision to which I have been referred precludes me from taking that view. The answer to the question will be in the affirmative.

The plaintiffs' vessel, which was found to be in a fit condition to take the ground for the purpose of unloading a cargo of iron ore, was damaged through straining, by reason of her lying on an uneven bottom in the defendants' wharf.

The Court held the defendants to blame in not keeping the berth in a fit and proper condition to receive the vessel, and held the plaintiffs entitled to recover such damages as were assessed by the registrar and merchants.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the French steamship Ville de St. Nazaire, a vessel of 1,556 tons gross, and built in 1883, and claimed to recover for the damage alleged to have been sustained by their vessel through straining while lying at the defendants' wharf at the Briton Ferry Works (Limited) in the Neath River, South Wales.

In November, 1901, The Ville de St. Nazaire was chartered to load a cargo of iron ore at Bilbao, and proceed thence to the defendants' wharf at Briton Ferry and there discharge.

On the 25th of January, 1902, the vessel arrived off Briton Ferry, and was moored alongside the defendants' wharf under the direction of the defendants' foreman.

The plaintiffs alleged that while the vessel was lying at the wharf she sustained very severe injuries through straining, which they attributed to the rough and uneven bottom of the berth, which they alleged was not in a fit state for the vessel to lie upon.

The defendants denied that allegation, and alleged that all reasonable means had been taken by them to insure that the berth was in a fit and proper condition, and that The Ville de Nazaire herself was not in a fit state of repair to take the ground, her plates being worn and thin, and she herself an old boat. They further alleged that after she had been put into position by their servant she was, on the night of the 27th of January, improperly shifted by her master some forty feet astern.

BUCKNILL, J., in delivering judgment, said: This is an action brought by the owners of the steamship Ville de St. Nazaire against the owners or lessees and occupiers of the Briton Ferry Iron Works Wharf to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the ship whilst lying and discharging at the defendants' wharf, and said to have been caused by the default of the defendants in omitting to take proper steps to make the berth reasonably safe for its occupation by the plaintiffs' ship. The Ville de St. Nazaire had been chartered by her owners to Messrs. Wedlake, and by them again to Cory & Co. to load a cargo of iron ore at Bilbao and proceed therewith to Briton Ferry Wharf and there deliver it according to charter-party and bills of lading. Cory & Co. indorsed the bills of lading to the defendants, who became the owners of the cargo in due course, and who knew that The St. Nazaire would arrive at their wharf about the 25th of January, 1902, and there discharge as customary—that is, that at certain times of the tide she would be aground. There was therefore an obligation on the part of the defendants to use reasonable care to have the berth or "layer" in a condition fit to receive the ship and to make it reasonably level. It was their custom and regular mode of business to do this, and it was admitted that it was to their own interest to see that it was properly done. They did not warrant that the berth should be in a fit and proper condition, but they impliedly undertook the duty and obligation which I have mentioned, and if they omitted to perform it and knew that the berth was not fit for the ship to occupy it, it was their duty to give notice to the owners' representatives before the ship arrived, so that they might exercise their discretion whether they would or would not berth the ship there and incur the risk of her being injured. Several questions arise for my decision: (1) Was The St. Nazaire in a fit and proper condition on her arrival at the berth to take the ground and discharge there at all times of tide? (2) Was the berth, as such, a fit and proper place for discharging cargo of this nature? Was it in a fit and proper condition when The Ville de St. Nazaire arrived there? (4) If not, was it in consequence of a failure of duty on the part of the defendants in that behalf? (5) If the ship was damaged whilst lying on the berth, was that damage caused wholly or in part in consequence of a failure of duty on behalf of the defendants, or was it caused by some independant act of the owners' representative?

The Ville de St. Nazaire is an iron screw steamship and was built in 1883 or 1884 to Lloyd's highest class, and in the Bureau Veritas under special survey, being also in their highest class, and at the time of the matters complained of she was, and had always been, kept up to her class both in Lloyd's and the Bureau Veritas. She is what is called a flat-bottomed ship, although, of course, not quite so. She has two more cross bulk-heads than required by Lloyd's, having six in all. She was built with 'tween decks, but in 1899, being intended for use in heavy cargo trades, some of her transverse beams had been removed to facilitate the loading of coal or mineral cargoes, and to compensate for that removal, web frames were introduced and strong angle irons were put in longitudinally on the inner edge of the stringer plate on both sides. All that was done under the inspection of the surveyor of the Bureau Veritas at Bordeaux. The surveyor of that society at Cardiff gave evidence that many vessels of her description take the ground and are fit to do so provided the berth is kept in a proper condition. Since 1899 she had discharged coal cargoes and one cargo of iron ore aground, but when waterborne to a certain extent, that is to say, that she was not left high and dry as she was at Briton Ferry when the tide was out. On the other side, Mr. Lewis, a marine surveyor of experience, gave it as his opinion that the ship being old and with somewhat worn shellplates was not fit to take the ground when loaded, and especially with a cargo of iron ore, which, he said, was a most trying one, and he thought it dangerous to have done so, and imputed her damage to what he called her own inherent weakness. The length of the ship was 260ft. over all, and 245ft. between perpendiculars. She was 34ft. in beam, and had 19ft. depth of hold. At Bilbao she loaded a cargo of 1,739 tons of iron ore, which was stowed as follows: 290 tons in hold No. 1, 676 tons in hold No. 2, 401 tons in hold No. 3, and 372 tons in hold No. 4. On the 22nd of January she began her voyage toward Briton Ferry, and, as might be expected at that time of the year, she encountered bad weather. The ship's and engineer's logs do not describe it as extraordinarily bad, and the engineer's log shows that no harm came to the engines and that nothing special happened in that department except that the ship had to be put head to sea twice to pump the water out of the bilges, there being some difficulty in doing it on account of the roses of the bilge pumps having become choked. It is not suggested that the ship sprang a leak on the voyage or that anything happened to injure the hull. But a great deal was made at the trial of a consular report made by the master on the 26th of January, the day after the ship's arrival at Briton Ferry, and after she had been aground there, and after she had, as alleged, been seriously injured in the way of her engine-room and boiler spaces. In that document the master stated that after a stormy passage, the ship, boilers, engines, &c., had suffered much by her violent rolling and pitching. He also stated that the ship and cargo arrived at their destination without apparent damage. In the same report he described the injuries the ship sustained on the night of the 25th and early morning of the 26th, "during the grounding alongside the quay."

I am convinced that the ship was not damaged during her voyage, and I attach no importance to what I may call the too usual language of her master in his consular report, made, perhaps, for another purpose, and unsupported by the facts. Nor can I accept the theory of Mr. Lewis that this ship was damaged by her own inherent weakness. I think she was a very strong ship, as I shall hereafter more particularly demonstrate, and it is a very important fact that, of several shellplates in her bottom that had to be removed when she was put in dry dock after leaving Briton Ferry Wharf, all of them, except one, were, after being faired, put back in their places and with the same rivet holes. The underwriters' representative would not have allowed this if the plates had been as thin and worn as suggested by the defendants. If it had been intended to rely on this point of inherent weakness and worn and thin plates, I should have expected to have received evidence of experts who had inspected the plates and the ship generally when she was in dry dock, about which there could have been no difficulty, for, if necessary, the court would have made an order giving leave for such inspection, but no such evidence was forthcoming A point was also made by the defendants that before the vessel was fixed for this cargo the owners stipulated that she should discharge always afloat, and it was suggested that the reason for doing so was that they were afraid to let her take the ground. But the answer is that the owners gave way on being assured by the charterers' agents that the berth at Briton Ferry was a safe one to discharge aground at, and that Messrs Moul's steamers did so regularly. It is natural that the owners of a large and valuable ship laden with a cargo of this description should prefer that the cargo should be discharged, the ship being always afloat, but in this case I attach no importance to the point, and one reason for the conclusion to which I have come is that not a word of evidence has been given to establish the fact that in the previous record of this ship she had been found to be weak or injured. In the case of a ship it is comparatively easy to ascertain when she has been repaired and the reason why.

The first question I answer by finding that The Ville de St. Nazaire was in a fit and proper condition on her arrival at Briton Ferry Wharf to take the ground and discharge there. I have now to determine when she was damaged, and on this part of the case I think there can be no sort of doubt. At 8 p.m. on the 25th of January, about high water, she arrived alongside the wharf and was safely and properly made fast. Her draught of water was 18ft. 2in. mean, but she was down about one foot by the stern. When the tide had ebbed one foot, the ship began to take the ground. It was high water that evening at 7.30. About 10 p.m. loud cracking noises were heard under the engine-room and boiler spaces by the master, the chief engineer, and the chief officer, and they continued more or less loudly until 5 a.m. of the next day. The chief engineer reported the matter at once to the chief officer, who went down to the engine-room and saw that the ship had been injured, and he described what he saw. At 10 p.m. there can be no doubt that the ship was waterborne, and probably had nine or ten feet of water round her. These cracking noises continued until the vessel became waterborne again on the following morning, when they ceased. This is an important fact in the case, because, when she had discharged coal cargoes at Nantes and Bordeaux and took no harm when aground, the suggested explanation was that she was always waterborne; but if waterborne then and no hurt was done to her, why was she damaged when at Briton Ferry and waterborne? There must be some reason for it, and I have already decided that she had not been injured on her voyage and that she was a strong and staunch ship when she arrived at Briton Ferry. On the Sunday morning, the 26th, the master and engineer examined the ship and detailed in evidence what they saw, and I accept their statements as true. The engines and the boilers were displaced. The bunker bulkheads were bulged, the boiler cradles were broken, and many strong stanchions were bent. All that damage was indicative of an upward pressure at the bottom of the ship from below and outside of it. On the Sunday the master and others on the ship inspected her at low water, and found that for about 60ft. or more from the stem going aft she was quite unsupported on the berth, and daylight for that distance could be seen under her, in some places there being as much as eighteen inches between the ship's bottom and the ground below. No doubt the master attributed the damage that he then saw to that cause, and on the Monday he drew the matter to the attention of a person whom he believed was the wharf manager, and he complained that it was caused by the bad condition of the berth. Having given a most careful consideration to the evidence of the experts, I conclude that the damage done was not caused by this overhang forwards. If the ship had been damaged by it, the location of the damage would have been in her upperworks, at the point of breaking strain and not under the engine-room where, in point of fact, it was. But not having been injured by this considerable overhang, I find that it indicated a great strength of the ship, for if she had been weak she could never have remained unhurt in her upper works. It must not be forgotten that in No. 1 hold, the furthest forward one, there was 290 tons of iron ore. I have no doubt that the injury done to the ship under the engine-room and boiler spaces was done on the night of the 25th and morning of the 26th of January. The master, thinking that the ship would break in two if left in her original berth, moved her on the Monday evening after the workmen had left off discharging cargo for the day, and he moved her back about forty feet from the position she first had. In a few hours, when the tide had somewhat ebbed, the same cracking noises were heard on board, but not in the same part of the ship as before. This time the noises were heard under No. 2 hold or further forward than before, No. 2 hold being that part of the ship next forward of the boiler space. There is no doubt that the damage in No. 2 hold and to the bottom of the ship under it was done on that Monday night and Tuesday early morning—as the tide fell and until it rose again sufficiently to float the ship.

The ship having been damaged in the way and at the times which I have found, I proceed to answer the next question, which is, Was the berth as such a fit and proper place for discharging cargoes of this nature? The answer is unhesitatingly, yes, provided it was properly looked after. Since 1890 no less than 459 ore cargoes were discharged there, and with very few exceptions without any complaint as to its condition. It is said that three such complaints were made with reference to three vessels, but they were never insisted on, and I pass them by, as, in my judgment, there is not enough evidence to prove that they could have been successfully established. I prefer to decide this case on the evidence relating to it, and to it only. Ample proof was produced at the trial that if the "layer" was properly looked after, it was a proper place at which vessels could lie in safety to themselves and discharge their cargo whilst aground. The next question is, was the berth in a fit and proper condition when The Ville de St. Nazaire arrived there? This is the difficult part of the case, and I have had to give it my most attentive and serious consideration. On cross-examination of the defendants' witnesses who spoke on the subject, it was established that although the berth was a good berth it would be unsafe for ships whilst unloading unless it was properly watched and looked after, and that it was necessary to level the ground after each ship had left it, and before another ship took its place. [His lordship then dealt in detail with the evidence as to what steps had been taken to prepare the berth for the reception of The Ville de St. Nazaire, and continued :] I have very carefully considered all the evidence that bears directly or indirectly on this question of the condition of the berth and I cannot accept the evidence of the defendants' servants, to whose carelessness I attribute the condition of the berth on the ship's arrival. I find myself obliged to come to the conclusion that this berth or layer was not in a fit and proper condition for The Ville de St. Nazaire on her arrival there, and I find that the ground was improperly and, for that ship with that cargo, dangerously uneven, and that that was the direct cause of the damage done to her on the first berthing, or in other words on the night of the 25th of January and the early morning of the 26th, and up to the time of her being removed on the evening of the 27th. That the uneven condition of the berth in the neighbourhood of the damage caused her to be unsupported forward and damaged aft I have no doubt, and it may also have been partly caused by her stern taking the ground on a hollow in the berth. The deputy harbour-master, one of the defendants' witnesses, stated that he had never seen a ship lying on that berth with so great an overhang as she had, and he also admitted that if he had found a ship set up amidships as this vessel was, he should conclude she had sat upon something hard, by which, of course, he meant something abnormal. The fact that so many ships have been at that berth with safety, coupled with my finding of fact that The Ville de St. Nazaire was a very strong ship and fit to discharge aground, is evidence that the berth could not have been on this occasion in a fit and proper condition to receive her.

There is yet another question to be answered. It has been pleaded by the defendants that after The Ville de St. Nazaire had been berthed on her arrival the master improperly shifted her to another place, and improperly omitted to attend to her mooring ropes from time to time as the tide rose and fell, and it is suggested that after she was removed by the master her bow was not hauled in against the wharf wall, and consequently moved or ranged about. It was also suggested that the effect of this shifting of the ship and berthing her at an angle and partly over her first berth caused her to lie in such a position that whatever inequalities she made or might have made on the first berth by her own weight became a danger to her, and that lying on them or on some part of them caused the injuries which she sustained or some of them. Mr. Bray, when addressing the court, said that this was clear to demonstration. Assuming the truth of the allegation as to her being improperly berthed after being shifted there would be a great deal in it, but I do not accept those allegations. What happened in fact was this: The master, believing that the damage which his ship had already sustained was due to the overhang forward, asked the leave of Mr. Roberts, one of the defendants' officials, to move her some forty feet astern, and whether he got such leave or not I find that he understood and thought that he had it. He could not speak English and Mr. Roberts could not speak French. So on the Monday evening, at high-water, the ship was shifted some forty feet astern, and was, as I find, properly made fast again and hauled in alongside the wharf as much as its somewhat curved shape (convex towards the ship) would allow. I find as a fact that the ship was properly shifted and that her master did it for the best and in the belief that it would save his ship from further damage. The veracity of the master has been severely attacked on more points than one, but I consider him a witness of truth, and any mistake which he may have made as to conversations I attribute to his want of knowledge of the English language. I decide this issue therefore in favour the plaintiffs, and find that the second damage to the ship was not caused by the act of her master, but in consequence of the improper condition of the berth. The result is that my judgment on all points must be, and is, in favour of the plaintiffs for such damages as may be assessed by the registrar and merchants, and costs.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — May 13, 29.

In re IBO INVESTMENT TRUST (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice— Costs— Company— Winding up— Appeal— More than one set of contributories supporting respondent in court below—One set of costs.

An appellant from an order on a winding-up petition, when the respondent has been supported in the court below by more than one set of contributories, if he does not wish to disturb that part of the order which gives one set of costs among those persons, should give notice by letters to the creditors or shareholders in question that an appeal is pending which, however, does not affect the order made in the court below, so far as their costs are concerned. If creditors or shareholders, after receiving such a letter, appear on, and successfully oppose, the appeal, they will only be entitled to one set of costs among them, the rule in the court below applying in such a case in the Court of Appeal.

In this case a petition to wind up the above company had been presented by a creditor and had been dismissed by Byrne, J., with costs.

There were two sets of contributories opposing the petition in the court below and one set of costs was allowed between them.

The petitioner appealed and his appeal was dismissed with costs.

The notice of appeal had been served on both sets of contributories, and they had appeared on the appeal.

The order, as drawn up, allowed only one set of costs of the appeal between the contributories.

The question was now raised whether the practice in the court below, of allowing one set of costs among the various successful contributories, applied to the case of contributories supporting the successful side on an appeal.

May 29.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case we took time to consider, because we wanted to ascertain from the learned registrars whether there was any settled practice as to how the costs ought to be dealt with in a case in which there was an appeal, and those persons, whether shareholders or creditors, who in the court below had supported the successful party were affected in this sense, that the order below was appealed, but there was nothing to deprive those persons who had in the court below supported the successful side, of the one set of costs which they get amongst them all, according to the fixed practice in the court in which the petition was presented.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now we have made inquiries, and we have had a most careful report made to us by the registrars, and the result is that it cannot be truly said that there is any fixed practice whatsoever in this matter.

Before I say what our conclusion is as to what the order ought to be under these circumstances, I propose to say a word about a case that was cited in the course of the discussion, In re New Gas Co., 25 W. R. 643, 5 Ch. D. 703. It was supposed that there was something said by Sir George Jessel in that case which disposed of this question, but if the decision is carefully looked at it does not dispose of this question at all. That was a case in which there was a petition for winding up the New Gas Co. which came before Vice-Chancellor Bacon. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that the petitioner had failed to establish his case and dismissed the petition, but ordered the creditors who opposed to pay their own costs. Now that was clearly wrong, because it was plain that the creditors who opposed, either collectively or individually, or in fact according to the established practice collectively, were entitled to one set of costs amongst them, and the Vice-Chancellor by his decision had refused them that set of costs. There was a suggestion there that there was a difference between a shareholder's petition and a creditor's petition. Sir George Jessel says: "I never heard of any distinction in this respect between a shareholder's petition and a creditor's petition. The advertisement which the company was bound to issue under the General Rules of 1862 says, 'Any creditor or contributory of the said company desiring to oppose the making of an order for the winding up of the said company under the above Act, should appear at the time of hearing by himself or his counsel for that purpose.' You have, therefore, invited the creditors to appear and oppose. I think they had a right to appear, and being successful they are entitled to one set of costs." That was really merely a reversal of the decision of Bacon, V.C., in the court of first instance, and that is all, in my opinion, that those words mean.

There being neither express authority nor practice in dealing with this matter, it rests with us, sitting as a Court of Appeal, to lay down a rule ourselves as to how the costs should be dealt with in cases where there is an appeal from the learned judge before whom the petition for winding up was heard; and we think that the proper rule to lay down is this: that the appellant, who presumably has been ordered to pay one set of costs amongst those shareholders or creditors who supported the respondent in the court below, must make up his mind whether it is worth his while to disturb that part of the order which gave to those shareholders or creditors who supported the successful party one set of costs. If, either, having paid that one set of costs he wishes to be recouped that amount, or, if he has not actually paid and is still under the original order, he wishes to get rid of that liability, in either of those cases he is asking for an order which obviously will affect personally those individual shareholders and creditors. He may think that it is not worth his while to run the risk of additional costs by asking for a discharge or modification of that part of the order, and under those circumstances he should really limit his appeal in that way; he should make it plain that by his appeal he does not seek to affect that part of the order which gave the one set of costs amongst those who supported the respondent. But then it is said, undoubtedly the shareholders and creditors who appeared below, at all events, had the right to appear on the appeal in the same way that they did in the court below, and they must not be excluded from that right; and somehow or other they must have that notice which they would have had in the court below under the advertisement to which Sir George Jessel refers in his judgment.

We think that that difficulty can be got over. The appellant who wishes to avoid the risk of costs in respect of these costs which those supporting the respondent below have either had paid to them or have the right to have paid to them, must write a letter to those creditors—he must know who they are—or to their solicitors, simply to tell them, if it be the fact, that he does not propose to ask either for recoupment or to disturb that part of the order—a letter which, if properly framed, must, of course, announce the fact of the pending appeal; and any creditors or shareholders who think fit to appear upon the appeal may do so, but they will do so under the rule we propose to lay down with full knowledge that the one set of costs amongst them all, a rule which is applied in the court of first instance, will continue to apply in the Court of Appeal. I hope that I have made my meaning plain, but it is shortly this, that inasmuch as there is an order here appealed against, which if appealed against in its entirety might be wholly reversed so as to take away from those creditors or shareholders the costs which they got in the court below, the appellant must take care to give due notice to those persons entitled to that right that he does not propose to ask to have the order modified or discharged in such a way as to effect at all the right to costs which has been given by the judgment in the court below to those creditors or shareholders supporting. But having regard to the fact that the shareholders and creditors will have the right to appear in the Court of Appeal if they like, notwithstanding that they personally are not proposed to be affected by the order that is asked for by the appellant, a letter such as that which I have suggested ought to be written to them saying that it is not proposed to affect that part of the order; and then if those creditors or shareholders like to appear, they will appear with the knowledge that they will only get one set of costs amongst them. In the present case both sets of contributories will get their costs, and the words of the order limiting them to one set will be struck out.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported [1903] 1 Ch. 806).

By an underlease dated the 16th of February, 1899, and made between the plaintiff Thomas Nixon of the one part and Louis Solomons of the other part, Nixon demised a messuage and premises known as No. 6, Crispin-street, Spitalfields, in the county of London, to Solomons for the term of twenty-one years from the 29th of September, 1898, at the rent therein mentioned. By the said indenture Solomons covenanted with Nixon that (among other things) Solomons would keep the demised premises in repair as therein mentioned, and the same and every part thereof so repaired would at the end and expiration or other sooner determination of the said term peaceably and quietly leave, surrender, and yield up unto Nixon "together with all doors, locks, keys, bolts, bars, staples, hinges, iron pins, wainscots, hearths, stones, marble and other chimney-pieces, slabs, shutters, fastenings, partitions, pipes, pumps, sinks, gutters of lead, posts, pales, rails, dressers, shelves, and all other erections, buildings, improvements, fixtures, and things which then were or which at any time during the said term should be fixed, fastened, or belong to the said demised messuage and premises or any part thereof." Solomons also covenanted that he would not use, exercise, or carry on, or permit to be used, exercised, or carried on, in any part of the demised premises, any trade or business whatsoever except that of a boot and shoe manufacturer, without the license and consent of the lessor Nixon or his superior landlord in writing first had and obtained; and that he Solomons would not erect on the premises any machinery other than that propelled by hand or foot without the consent in writing of Nixon.

By an indenture of the 30th of May, 1902, the premises comprised in the said underlease of the 16th of February, 1899, were sub-demised by the plaintiff Nixon to the plaintiff Lambourn by way of mortgage for securing the payment of £600 and interest.

In November, 1902, Solomons was adjudicated bankrupt and the defendant Henry McLellan was appointed trustee of his property in the bankruptcy.

The defendant as trustee in bankruptcy advertised for sale by auction on the premises demised by the underlease of the 16th of February, 1899, certain stock-in-trade and machinery which comprised the following articles—namely: (a) On the second floor of the messuage three wooden stands reaching from floor to roof; (b) on the first floor of the messuage four heel-building machines, one heel-attaching machine, and one channelling machine; (c) on the ground floor of the messuage one heel finisher machine or heel trimmer, one sole-edge trimming machine or edge setter, one scouring machine, four wooden stands reaching from floor to roof, and certain fitted shafting and other machinery (including a conveyor and piping); and (d) in the basement an electric motor machine.

The plaintiffs requested the defendant to withdraw the above-mentioned articles from the sale on the ground that they were the property of the plaintiffs by virtue of the covenants in the underlease which was still subsisting and was vested in the defendant as trustee in bankruptcy. The defendant declined to withdraw the articles from the sale, and contended that he was entitled to sell them separately and so as to involve their removal from the premises. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action to obtain a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to remove or cause the removal from the demised premises of the articles or any other erections, buildings, improvements, fixtures, or things which then or at any time during the term created by the underlease of the 16th of February, 1899, had been or should be fixed, fastened, or belonging to the demised premises or any part thereof, and an injunction to restrain such removal.

It was not disputed at the trial in the court below that the articles in question were articles used in the bankrupt's trade, and the only question argued was whether the articles being trade fixtures were subject to the covenant contained in the underlease for the yielding up of fixtures and other articles as above mentioned.

Kekewich, J., following Bidder v. Trinidad Petroleum Co., 17 W. R. 153, held that the covenant by reason of the general words therein contained extended to the trade fixtures, and made the declaration asked for.

The defendant appealed.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and E. Ford, for the appellant.—The concluding words of the covenant ought to be construed according to the ejusdem generis doctrine. Bishop v. Elliott, 3 W. R. 454, 11 Exch. 113, and Dumergue v. Rumsey, 12 W. R. 205, 2 H. & C. 777, govern the present case; Bidder v. Trinidad Petroleum Co., and Wilson v. Whateley, 9 W. R. 331, 1 Joh. & H. 436, are distinguishable.

Stewart Smith, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree with the observation of Kekewich, J., that the authorities which have been cited in this case do not leave the question of the construction of the covenant in this case very clear. We have come to the conclusion that this covenant does not throw upon the tenant the obligation of yielding up on the determination of the term trade fixtures of the class described in an affidavit which has been accepted on both sides as fairly describing the trade fixtures in question. I will not go through the affidavit in detail, but speaking generally of the trade machinery here, it is not machinery which, when put up, becomes an integral part of or an addition to the building. On the contrary, it seems to me plain that the only connection of the trade machinery with the building was for the more convenient user of the machinery for the purposes of the business. Some part of the machinery, no doubt, could be used in connection with other machinery if put there, but I do not think that any part of it was placed on the premises for the improvement of them, but only for the more convenient user of the machinery. Having said that as to the subject-matter, I come to the lease. The tenant is described as a boot and shoe manufacturer, and it is plain that it was contemplated that he should carry on that business upon the premises. The being the intention of both parties to the lease as to the user of the premises, then comes the covenant for delivery up of the premises at the end of the term, which contains the words that we have to construe. Now, primâ facie, apart from express agreement, trade fixtures would be removable by the tenant under such a lease as this at the end of his term. We have, therefore, to see whether, on the true construction of this covenant, the right of removal is taken away from the tenant. If one looks at the particular words of the covenant, as regards those words which end with the word "shelves," it is not easy to say of any one of them that it is not of such a character that under the ordinary law it would be irremovable by the tenant. These fixtures are such as are sometimes described as landlord's fixtures, meaning thereby, to my mind, fixtures which a tenant cannot under the ordinary law remove as against his landlord by reason of their attachment to the premises. Of all these articles of which I am speaking, although some of them might be in the nature of removable fixtures, still there is not one that might not be just as well an irremovable fixture. However that might be, it is plain that the particular enumeration here does not include this machinery. The word machinery is not used from beginning to end of the covenant, and when there is a lease of premises for the express purpose of their being used for a boot and shoe manufactory it is, as a matter of business, very difficult to believe that if the landlord really meant that the machinery was not to be removed by the tenant he should not have said so in plain words. It is a most important thing and yet it is not mentioned from beginning to end of the covenant. It is not contended that there is anything in these particular words which would cover machinery; and if the tenant is to be restricted from removing this machinery, the restriction must be found in the general words of the covenant. Curiously enough, this case seems to be the exact converse of Burt v. Haslett. In that case there was a particular enumeration of the articles to be yielded up by the tenant at the end of the term, and general words not very unlike the general words here, and the Court of Common Pleas held that the particular plate-glass front which had been put into the shop there came within the enumeration as being a window. But when the case came on a writ of error before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that court was not satisfied whether the plate-glass front was a window, or whether it came within the general words as an improvement, but they held that in one way or the other it was clearly within the covenant, and therefore not removable by the tenant. As to the covenant in the present case, in my judgment, it does not much matter in which way one looks at it. This machinery does not come within the enumeration of the particular words, nor within the general words, even though one leaves out the application of the ejusdem generis doctrine. I think the present case could be decided on the basis of Bishop v. Elliott and Dumergue v. Rumsey. Both those cases show that the ejusdem generis rule is to be applied in this way—namely, that if you can find in the things described by the particular words some characteristic constituting them a genus, then you should limit the general words which follow them to things of that genus. In the present case all the articles enumerated by the particular words according to their natural meaning have the common characteristic of irremovability, and in these circumstances I think we ought only to apply the general words to articles of that genus. But, even apart from that, construing the general words here without any such limitation, I should come to the same conclusion from a consideration of the general words themselves. The general words are "erections, buildings, improvements, fixtures." Taking them separately, I think with regard to "erections," subject to what I shall have to say presently, that word cannot properly be applied to machinery fastened to the floor of the premises for more convenient user. To use the words of Lord Macnaghten in London and South African Exploration Co. v. De Beers Consolidated Mines, [1895] A. C. 451, 43 W. R. Dig. 28—speaking of the word "improvements"—"that is not the natural or proper meaning of the expression, which seems to be more applicable to something attached to and forming an integral part of the thing improved than to something which is merely added to it or placed upon it without annexation or union." In the same way I think that what I have indicated is not the natural meaning of the word "erections," and for that reason I think that the word, especially when used in immediate collocation with "buildings," has no application to things placed on the floor of the the house without any idea of adding to it in any sense. I read the word "improvements" in a similar way. With regard to the provision that the lessee shall not erect on the premises any machinery other than that of a specified kind without the consent of the landlord, I do not think that binds us as to the meaning to be put upon the word "erections" in the general words of the other covenant in the collocation in which we there find it. Then when we come to the word "fixtures," I think that if we look at the covenant as a whole, and bear in mind the proper application of the ejusdem generis doctrine, we are not entitled to hold that these articles of machinery, which are clearly removable, come within it. It is desirable that we should lay down such a rule that landlords and tenants may know once and for all, that if a man is letting a house which is to be fitted with machinery to a tenant who intends to use the house for the purpose of a trade, and the landlord means to restrict the natural right of the tenant to remove trade machinery or fixtures placed so as to be more conveniently used, and not to be added to the premises, he must say so plainly. It seems to me that if the language used leaves the matter doubtful, the ordinary right of the tenant to remove trade fixtures must not be interfered with.

ROMER, L.J.—I have felt extreme doubt about this case, but on careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that the appellant is right. What has to a great extent induced me to come to this conclusion is the knowledge that we must all have, how extremely hard it would be to a tenant under an ordinary lease to hold that he had lost his ordinary right to remove trade fixtures put up by him merely by the use of ordinary general words in the covenant in the lease as to delivering up the demised premises at the end of his term, unless it can be clearly gathered that the words were meant to cover the fixtures and prevent the tenant from removing them. In order to show that the covenant for delivery up has taken away the tenant's rights, the onus is strongly on the landlord to make it clear that that was the object and intention of the covenant. That is borne out by Bishop v. Elliott. That case proceeds on that principle, and the decision has stood unimpugned for many years, and we ought not lightly to depart from it It is very important that on such a subject as we have to deal with here the law should be settled as much as possible, and it would, I think, be very unfortunate if we should be compelled to differentiate this case from Bishop v. Elliott and to hold that the tenant in the present case had lost his right to remove trade fixtures. Bishop v. Elliott proceeded upon the broad view, that if you find in such a covenant as we have here a series of words which point to and can only be satisfied by referring them to additions to premises which ordinarily would not as between landlord and tenant be removable by the tenant, then, if general words follow those words, the general words ought to be confined to things not included in tenant's fixtures unless there is something which clearly shows an express intention that they were not to be so confined. In the present case I think every one of the words used in the particular enumeration might fairly be held to refer to additions to the premises which as between the landlord and tenant would not be ordinarily removable by the tenant if put up by him. In my opinion, on principle, the present case cannot be distinguished from Bishop v. Elliott, and in the circumstances it is far better to treat that case as intended to lay down an intelligible rule to be followed in all cases rather than to attempt to draw nice distinctions which will make it difficult for people to know what has to be delivered up and what has not when premises have to be given up at the end of a term. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am not prepared to depart from the view taken by Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ., though I am not free from doubt. I think that the rule laid down in Bishop v. Elliott is binding on us, and I am not disposed to draw too narrow distinctions as regards the application of it to this lease. The wording of leases is peculiar, and I doubt whether in any document other than a lease it would be proper to apply the doctrine of Bishop v. Elliott. But on the whole I am not prepared to differ from or to narrow the rule laid down in that case so as to include under the general words of the covenant trade fixtures brought on to the premises by the tenant.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported as In re T——, ante, p. 568, [1903] 1 Ch. 457).

The applicant was tenant for life under certain wills of a large amount of personal estate. Subject to that life interest, the property went to the applicant's children other than her eldest son, she having a power of appointment in the usual form. That power had been extensively exercised, and the appointees had settled their shares so that their children born or unborn had become interested. In order to raise money for purposes not necessary to be specified, the applicant had insured her life for large amounts in first-class offices, and had mortgaged her life estate to secure interest and premiums. It was proposed that the trustees of the wills should take over this security. Accordingly, an originating summons was taken out by the applicant asking the sanction of the court to this proposal. The policies afforded an ample margin as regards capital, and the income of the trust estate was largely in excess of the interest and premiums, so that the transaction was perfectly safe. In order to take over the security it would be necessary for the trustees to realize trust investments yielding 3 per cent. per annum, whereas the mortgage interest was calculated on a rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, and the amount of the mortgage debt was such that the difference of ½ per cent. would make a large addition to the applicant's income. The application, however, was in no wise based on her personal benefit. She had been in the habit of making an allowance to her husband, who was without means, and she wished to make some provision for her eldest son, who was also without means. All the children were more or less dependent on the applicant, who had by settlements made on the marriages of some of them covenanted to make annual payments to them, and had been in the habit of making voluntary allowances to those entitled under the covenants and the other children. She found it difficult to maintain these payments and allowances and also to keep up the house in which she resided, and which she naturally wished to keep up as a family home. She foresaw increasing demands on her purse, and she was at a loss to know how to meet them without an increase of income. The proposed transaction would give that increase to so substantial an extent as to enable her to do what she desired, and it was not open to doubt that this would be for the benefit of the children.

Kekewich, J., refused the application, on the ground that there was no emergency in the administration of the trust.

The applicant appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and J. R. Northcote, for the applicant.—The court has jurisdiction to authorize the change of investment, it being in the interest of all the beneficiaries: Brooke v. Lord Mostyn, 13 W. R. 115, 2 De G. J. & S. 373; In re New, 50 W. R. 17, [1901] 2 Ch. 534. The investment is perfectly safe. The question is one of administration and management, and the court, therefore, has jurisdiction. Further, this is a case where the trustees, if they had committed this breach of trust, would have been relieved by the court under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is admitted that the applicant cannot succeed unless she can bring herself within In re New. The effect of that case shortly is this, that in the course of the administration of an estate, such an emergency may occur that the court may authorize a departure from the strict terms of the trust. It cannot be said that there is any such emergency here. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, and with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I will only add that in my opinion In re New constitutes the high-water mark of the exercise by the court of its extraordinary jurisdiction in relation to trusts.

SILLES v. FULHAM BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a.)

Metropolis—Management Acts—Drain—Sewer—Drain carrying sewage from one house and rain-water from another house—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250.

A drain used for the drainage of two houses, and not made under an order of any vestry or district board, comes within the definition of "sewer" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, although so far as one of the houses is concerned it is a drain for rain-water only.

Holland v. Lazarus, 66 L. J. Q. B. 285, 45 W. R. Dig. 99, approved.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., on the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by the owner of two houses in the metropolitan borough of Fulham to recover a sum of money expended by him in abating a nuisance which had arisen from a certain pipe or drain under a threat of proceedings on the part of the defendant borough council, acting under section 85 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. The plaintiff alleged that the pipe or drain in question was a "sewer," and that therefore the defendants ought themselves to have done the work necessary to abate the nuisance.

The two houses were built in one block. The pipe or drain in question carried sewage from one of the houses, but not from the other, into the main sewer. A gutter running along under the eaves at the backs of both houses carried a portion of the rain-water from the roofs of both houses into a down pipe. The down pipe discharged into a gully and from thence into the pipe or drain in question.

By section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, "the word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board; and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies."

It was not suggested that the pipe or drain in question had been made for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of a vestry or district board.

Wright, J., following the case of Holland v. Lazarus, 66 L. J. Q. B. 285, 45 W. R. Dig. 99, held that the pipe or drain in question was a sewer, and he therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Macaskie, K.C., and Sylvain Mayer, for the defendants.—The case of Holland v. Lazarus was wrongly decided. The words "drain" and "sewer" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, apply only to drains and sewers in the ordinary sense of pipes used for the carriage of fœcal and refuse matter. The pipe in question is "used for the drainage of one building only" within the meaning of the section, and is therefore a drain. It is not converted into a sewer by the fact that rain-water from the roof of another house flows into it.

They cited Geen v. Newington Vestry, 46 W. R. 624, [1898] 2 Q. B. 1; and Reg. v. Vestry of St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green, 44 W. R. 697, [1896] 2 Q. B. 319.

Mattinson, K.C., and J. C. Earle, for the plaintiff.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is admitted that this case is substantially governed by the decision in Holland v. Lazarus, if that decision is correct. The effect of that case and of Geen v. Vestry of St. Mary, Newington, is this—that where there are two drains carrying sewage from two buildings respectively and running together into one drain, which carries the sewage of both buildings, but which is not a drain made for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of a vestry or district board, that drain is a sewer within the meaning of the definition of "sewer" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855; and further, that if one of the two drains happens to be a drain which only carries rain-water, that makes no difference, but the drain which ultimately carries off the rain-water from the one building and the sewage from the other equally comes within the definition of "sewer" as if it carried sewage from both. Section 250 provides as follows: "The word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board; and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies." The decision in Holland v. Lazarus is that a drain comes within the definition of "sewer" where it is used for the drainage of two buildings, even although, so far as one of the buildings is concerned, it only carries off rain-water. I think that that decision is correct, and that Wright, J., properly applied the two cases to the facts of the present case.

to be tried to determine whether S. M. H. was liable to have execution levied against him on the judgment.

Held, that one of the questions to be tried in the issue ought to be whether S. M. H. had held himself out as a partner in the defendant firm.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers.

The action was brought on a bill of exchange for the price of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant firm.

The writ was issued against "Hyman & Co.," and was served under ord. 48A, r. 3, at the principal place of business of the defendant firm on the person having the control and management of the business there. An appearance to the writ was entered in the name of "Herbert Hyman, sued as Hyman & Co." On an application under order 14 the plaintiff recovered final judgment in the action.

The plaintiff being unable to satisfy his judgment against Herbert Hyman, and having reason to believe that the firm consisted of two partners, Herbert Hyman and Sydney Maurice Hyman, took out a summons in the action under rule 8 of order 48A, asking that an issue might be ordered to be tried to determine whether Sydney Maurice Hyman was liable to have execution issued against him on the judgment.

The master made an order that an issue should be tried between the plaintiff and S. M. Hyman, and that the question to be tried in the issue should be whether S. M. Hyman was, or had held himself out as, a partner in the defendant firm.

On appeal Phillimore, J., varied the order of the master, directing that the question to be tried should be whether S. M. Hyman was at the date when the bill of exchange was given or at the date when the goods were supplied a member of the defendant firm of Hyman & Co.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ord. 48A, r. 8, provides as follows: "Where a judgment or order is against a firm, execution may issue: (a) Against any property of the partnership within the jurisdiction; (b) against any person who has appeared in his own name under rule 5 or 6, or who has admitted on the pleadings that he is, or who has been adjudged to be, a partner; (c) against any person who has been individually served, as a partner, with the writ of summons, and has failed to appear. If the party who has obtained judgment or an order claims to be entitled to issue execution against any other person as being a member of the firm, he may apply to the court or a judge for leave so to do; and the court or judge may give such leave if the liability be not disputed, or if such liability be disputed may order that the liability of such person be tried and determined in any manner in which any issue or question in an action may be tried and determined."

Edward Clayton, for the plaintiff.—The order of the judge, tying down the inquiry to the question whether the Hymans were actually partners inter se, is erroneous. The question whether Sydney Maurice Hyman is liable as a co-partner by estoppel ought not to be excluded from the inquiry. The order of the master ought to be restored.

Carrington, for S. M. Hyman.—The issue to be tried under rule 8 of order 48A is whether any particular person is liable "as being a member of the firm," not whether he is liable as a partner under section 14 of the Partnership Act, 1890. If the issue included an inquiry as to holding out, the result would be that a person might be made liable who had never been served in the original proceedings, and had therefore never had an opportunity of setting up a defence.

He cited Wigram v. Cox, Sons, Buckley, & Co., [1894] 1 Q. B. 792.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question which we have to consider is whether one of the questions to be determined in the issue ought to be whether S. M. Hyman has held himself out as a partner in the defendant firm. If he has not done so, no execution will issue against him or his goods. If he has done so, he ought to be altogether estopped from denying his membership in the firm. And in such circumstances there seems to be no hardship in his having execution issued against him in a case where a writ has been issued against the partnership firm and served under order 48A, r. 3. I do not think it is necessary to determine the exact form of words in which under rule 8 an order for an issue in such a case should be drawn. I desire only to decide this particular case. In my opinion the order of the master is one which carries out the rule, and it does not impose any hardship on the person against whom it is made. The appeal will therefore be allowed, and the order of the master restored.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I see no likelihood of hardship being inflicted by the rule being followed. [The Lord Justice read rule 8 of order 48A.] Here a person is alleged to be liable as a member of the defendant firm, and there is a a question whether the liability arises from his being really a member of the firm or by reason of his holding himself out to be a member of the firm. It is suggested that, if such questions were allowed to be tried, a person might be held liable who had never been served with the writ, and who would thus be deprived of the opportunity of raising any defence. But the issue is a general one, whether the person is liable as a member of a firm, and it seems to me that any proper defence might be raised in the issue. I think the order of the master was right.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

TAGART, BEATON, & CO. v. JAMES FISHER & SONS. WEST HARTLEPOOL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. (LIMITED), THIRD PARTIES. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Freight—Lien of shipowner on sub-freight.

A lien on sub-freight given by a charter-party to a shipowner as security for the payment to him of the hire of the ship can only be exercised before such sub-freight has been paid to the charterer or his agent, and, therefore, when once the sub-freight has been so paid the shipowner has no right, by virtue of his lien, to follow the sub-freight.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bigham, J., who tried the action without a jury in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs, Tagart, Beaton, & Co., were timber brokers in London, and they acted as agents for the sale of timber shipped to England from Pensacola by a firm named Baars, Dunwody, & Co.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs against Messrs. Fisher & Sons, of Barrow-in-Furness, who brought in the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. (Limited) as third parties, and during the proceedings these third parties were ordered to be joined as defendants.

The facts were stated in the judgment of Bigham, J., as follows:

By a charter-party dated the 6th of October, 1900, the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. (Limited), who were the owners of the steamship The Askehall, chartered The Askehall to Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, & Co. for three years (thirty-six calendar months).

The only material terms of this charter-party were that the captain was to be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangement, the charterers indemnifying the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain signing bills of lading or otherwise complying with the same, and that the owners should have a lien upon all cargoes and sub-freights for any amount due under the charter.

The hire under the charter-party was to be £1,750 per month, payable monthly in advance; also by the terms of the charter-party the vessel was while in dry dock to be "off hire."

By the course of business between the plaintiffs and Baars, Dunwody, & Co., when Baars, Dunwody, & Co. made shipments of timber from Pensacola to the plaintiffs in London, they drew upon the plaintiffs for a part of the values of the shipments, and when the goods were sold the proceeds were placed by the plaintiffs to the credit of Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, & Co.'s account with them.

In June, 1901, Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, & Co.'s account with the plaintiffs was in debit to about £7,000.

The ship being at Pensacola, Baars, Dunwody, & Co. desired to load her with a cargo of their own, and they therefore, by a charter-party dated the 15th of May, 1901, purported to charter the vessel for some nominees of their own for a voyage to Barrow to carry timber at a fixed freight at so much per standard. Having entered into this charter-party, they shipped the goods and then drew out the bill of lading, in which they appeared as shippers, and by which the goods were to be delivered to their assignees, he or they paying freight as per this charter-party of the 15th of May, 1901.

The captain, then, at Baars, Dunwody, & Co.'s request, signed bills of lading indorsing upon them a statement that he had received £3,750 on account of the freight. The captain also gave a freight note by which he acknowledged that he had received a further sum of £1,000 on account of freight.

The freight note for £1,000, which was signed by the captain, was, so far as is material, in the following terms:

"27th of May, 1901.—Five days after arrival at port of destination of The Askehall, of which I am master, I promise to pay to the order of myself one thousand pounds, value received, for account of freight on cargo now on board my said vessel, payable under terms of charter-party, dated the 15th of May, 1901, and for the payment of this note I pledge my said freight, and the consignees of my cargo and (or) my agents are hereby directed to pay the amount of this obligation from the first amount due for freight."

This note was indorsed by the captain as follows: "Pay Tagart, Beaton, & Co. or order.—A. Tritton."

On the 29th of May, 1901, Baars, Dunwody, & Co. sent to the plaintiffs the shipping documents—namely, the bills of lading for the quantity of timber shipped on The Askehall; the shipping value of the timber was represented as £3,867. These bills of lading, which were signed by the captain in the ordinary way, showed that the goods were shipped by Baars, Dunwody, & Co. to order, and that the freight was payable by the consignees as per the charter-party dated the 15th of May, 1901. The bills of lading contained an acknowledgment on their face that £3,750 had been advanced against the freight at the port of shipment, so that the value of the goods with the paid freight amounted to £7,617.

Against this Baars, Dunwody, & Co. drew on the plaintiffs for £6,000; and instructed the plaintiffs to sell the goods on Baars, Dunwody, & Co.'s account in the ordinary way and place the proceeds to Baars, Dunwody, & Co.'s credit. In the same letter of the 29th of May, 1901, there was enclosed to the plaintiffs the above freight note for £1,000, and it was referred to in the letter in the following way: "We enclose freight note per The Askehall for £1,000 to credit of our account." As a matter of fact the captain had received nothing on account of freight, nothing for the indorsement of the receipt of the £3,750 on the bills of lading, and nothing for the £1,000 freight note.

The receipt of the bills of lading and freight note was acknowledged by the plaintiffs in a letter of the 18th of June, 1901, the reference to the freight note being as follows: "We are very much obliged to you for freight note £1,000, which we will pass to the credit of your account after collection." On the 9th of July 1901, the plaintiffs sold the timber to arrive to a firm of Crosfield & Co., the vessel being ordered to Barrow.

The defendants, Messrs. James Fisher & Sons, were shipping agents at Barrow, and they wished to secure the ship's business at that port. Accordingly on the 10th of July they telegraphed to the plaintiffs asking if they might have the business. To this telegram the plaintiffs answered directing the defendants, Messrs. Fisher & Sons, to address their request to a Captain Dyason, of Poole, who was the agent in England of Baars, Dunwody, & Co., to attend to their shipping business. On the same day the defendants wrote to Captain Dyason asking for the consignment to them of the ship, and the business was given to them. It thus became the defendants' duty to superintend the delivery of the cargo and to collect from the buyers of the cargo so much of the freight as remained payable in England.

On the 13th of July Captain Dyason wrote to the defendants giving the particulars of the freight to be collected: "Freight.—The freight is to be taken up as follows: Total per bills of lading £6,385; advances £3,750—£1,635. Captain's note on freight £1,000; balances £635." So that the defendants knew that they had to collect £1,635, of which £1,000 was to be used in redeeming the captain's freight note, and the balance was to be accounted for to Captain Dyason.

On the 15th of July the plaintiffs sent a note to the defendants that they were the holders of the note for £1,000, adding: "We will forward same for collection to your address in due time." This notice was acknowledged by the defendants on the 16th of July: "We note you have the captain's promissory note for £1,000. Bills of lading show £3,750 advanced freight, so it will be several days before we can get freight to meet your promissory note." This meant that as so much freight had apparently been paid in advance, a great part of the cargo would have to be delivered before more freight could be asked for.

On the 19th of July The Askehall arrived at Barrow, and on the 20th of July the discharge began.

On the 25th of July the plaintiffs sent the promissory note through their bankers for presentation to the defendants.

The note was duly presented on the 26th of July, but, the defendants not having collected any freight from Messrs. Crosfield & Co., it was refused payment and was marked by the banker: "Answer: Cannot pay at present, not having been provided with funds for it."

On the 29th of July Messrs. Crosfield & Co. paid the defendants £1,000 on account of freight, and the discharge of the vessel was completed.

On the 3rd of August the cargo having been measured, Crosfield & Co. paid a further £400 to the defendants, so that by that time the defendants had ample funds in hand to pay the note. But in the meantime—namely, on the 1st of August, the owners of the vessel, the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co., intervened by sending to the defendants the following telegram: "Don't pay either captain or time charterers' drafts out of freight. Hold same our account and risk; we hold you free all liability in consequence thereof."

Before this telegram was received the defendants had sent word to the bankers that if the note was presented again it might be met in three or four days, and they wrote to the West Hartlepool Co. telling them so, and adding: "We look upon the note as a first charge upon the freight."

On the same day, the 1st of August, the West Hartlepool company wrote a letter to the defendants which explained the reason of their intervention. It was as follows: "West Hartlepool, 1st August, 1901. Messrs. James Fisher & Sons, Barrow-in-Furness. Dear Sirs,—Steamship Askehall,—We telegraphed you this morning as per copy inclosed, which we beg to confirm. The time charterers' representative, Captain Dyason, intimated to Captain Tritton to-day that time charterers did not intend continuing the charter although The Askehall is fixed for three years, and has so far only been six months under charter, and as the hire is also due to-day and has not been paid, we intend exercising our lien on the freight in accordance with the terms of the charter for the hire unpaid and consequential damages. We therefore asked you not to make any remittance of any part of the freight due on present cargo to time charterers, not to pay either their drafts or captain's drafts drawn at the loading port against the freight and payable at this side, we, of course, holding you harmless in regard to any consequences resulting out of such action. For the present we wish you simply to hold the freight as trustees until we have been able to come to some agreement with time charterers, and will keep you informed. In reference to bankers we may communicate with you again."

It appeared that it was inaccurate to say that on the 1st of August any chartered freight was due under the original charter-party of October, 1900, a month's hire in advance falling due on the 2nd of August at noon. It would have fallen due on the 1st of August but for the fact that the ship had gone into dry dock on completing her discharge, and did not come out until noon on the 2nd of August, and while in dry dock she was, by the terms of the charter-party, "off hire."

On the 1st of August a formal notice of the alleged lien for chartered hire was served on the defendants on behalf of the West Hartlepool company.

On the 6th of August the note was again presented to the defendants for payment and was marked "Still unable to pay."

The present action was then brought for £1,000, the amount of the freight note, by the plaintiffs, Tagart, Beaton, & Co., against the defendants, James Fisher & Sons, who were defending the action under the direction and with the indemnity of the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co.

The question was whether the defendants, who had on the 6th of August sufficient funds in hand from the freight to meet the freight note, were bound to pay the plaintiffs.

Bigham, J., held that, in order for the lien of the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. to become operative, notice of it ought to have been served on the persons who had to pay the freight, and not upon the persons who were receiving it for the time charterers, and he therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £1,000.

From this judgment the defendants now appealed.

Bankes, K.C. (Noad with him), for the defendants, who were now appellants.—In this case the defendants stand in the shoes of the shipowners, and therefore have, as against the plaintiffs, the same rights as the shipowners would have had. According to the terms of the charter-party of the 6th of October, 1900, the shipowners were to have a lien upon all sub-freights for the amount of the hire due under the charter-party as against the plaintiffs, and therefore the defendants have now a right under such lien to seize the freight at any time so long as it can be identified as freight, even after it has come into the hands of the charterer's agents. The plaintiffs, at their best, can be in no better position than as agents for collecting and handing over to Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, & Co. the moneys received by them, and therefore they can be in no better position than their principals. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs are in no better a position than Messrs. Baars, Dunwody, & Co., and therefore they are not bonâ fide holders for value. Consequently the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action. There is no authority on the point.

Hamilton, K.C. (Loehnis with him), for the respondents.—In this case the judgment below was right, and the defendants are not entitled to succeed on their appeal. A lien on sub-freight can only be exercised so long as there is a freight to be paid; once the freight has come into possession of the time charterer or his agents the lien is gone, and the freight can no longer be traced as freight. Therefore, as soon as the freight was paid by Crosfield & Co. to James Fisher & Sons, the agents for Baars, Dunwodie, & Co., the lien of the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. ceased to exist. The question as to lien on sub-freights has been considered an open one: see Carver on Carriage by Sea (3rd ed.), s. 655.

Noad replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that the judgment in this case was perfectly right. Confining myself to the only question with which I think it is necessary to deal here, I am of opinion that it is quite clear that the right—which is an important right, whether it is called a lien, or whatever it is called—must be exercised at the time when there is freight to be paid. That, really, is the short point. If the freight has been paid the lien is gone, and the moment it is paid into the hands of the agents for Baars, Dunwody, & Co., who are the persons entitled to receive it, the shipowners' right to stop it on its way to them is gone. If it has been paid as freight, then it has been paid, and the thing has ceased to exist as freight. It is not necessary to descend into any subtleties to consider what is the freight in the sense of in what particular form it has been paid, whether it has been paid by a cheque or in what way as a matter of business it has been disposed of. The right to stop the payment of it to the person to whom it is due must be exercised while that right for payment exists. If that payment has been already made, the opportunity of exercising the lien is gone, and I am of opinion that, as the freight had been handed by the consignees to the defendants, Fisher & Sons, who were the agents of Baars, Dunwody, & Co., it was as much paid in this case as if it had been handed over to Baars, Dunwody, & Co., and they had been physically there present and put it into their own pocket. Under those circumstances could it be contended that there was some right of stoppage of the money in their pockets? Of course, if that is not so, I am of opinion it is exactly the same thing if their agents received it in the character in which it was paid, and that when it was so paid there was no longer any lien upon it. Therefore I am of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., was right, and must be affirmed.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I only wish to add a word or two, because the ground on which I concur is entirely that which has been stated by the Lord Chancellor, but I think as there are certain other matters referred to in the judgment of Bigham, J., I should indicate one or two on which I am not quite clear. If we had had to decide that its being freight, and received by Fisher as freight, and still in his hands as freight, the shipowner could not claim it, because Fisher was trustee for Tagart, I should have had very great doubt, and, therefore, I do not want to endorse that part of the judgment at all. It is, however, very curious to note that long before I delivered judgment in a case recently before me, Bigham, J., had expressed what seems to me the right view about these freight notes, because he says "The captain has no right to make any arrangement between himself and the time charterers which would have the effect of varying the terms of the charter-party by excluding the owner's lien." I only mention that because it bears on the judgment which I gave the other day. The ground on which I desire to concur with what the Lord Chancellor said and with Bigham, J., is this, as stated by the latter in his judgment: "In the present case these considerations appear to me to be immaterial, for before the lien could be exercised, there being no chartered freight payable"—I will leave that out of the question—"£1,000 of the bill of lading freight had been paid to the defendants, who for the purpose of the receipt of the money stood in the position of the time charterers themselves, and no lien afterwards could be exercised on that sum." Then with regard to some arrears of freight said to be due amounting to the £159 he finds in the same way that it got into the pockets of the agents of Dunwody before any lien could be exercised. Putting the matter in my own way, as I understand it, a lien for sub-freight in these time charters means a right to stop freight and receive freight as such, and does not mean the right to follow the proceeds into the pockets of somebody else because the money which had been so received was paid in respect of a debt due for freight. Upon the grounds which the Lord Chancellor has put, I think this judgment clearly ought to be supported; but I express no opinion on the other parts of the case, to which it is not necessary to any further refer.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I may add for myself that I designedly avoided dealing with the question to which the Lord Chief Justice referred, and I desire to confine my judgment entirely to the point which has been mentioned.

Sir FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—I agree with the judgments which have been delivered, and have nothing to add.

Farwell, J. }

In re CORNWALLIS - WEST AND MUNRO'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Settled land—Compound settlement—Resettlement—New life estate "in restoration and continuance of" former life estate—Appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2, 20, 22, 40—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 4.

In 1850, under a will, lands were settled to the use of A. for life, with remainder to B. in tail, and A. was thereby empowered to create a jointure rent-charge for his wife. In 1872 A. by deed charged the lands with a jointure for his wife. In 1895 A. and B. by a disentailing assurance conveyed the lands to such uses as A. and B. should jointly appoint, and by a deed of resettlement of even date they appointed the lands to the use of A. for life "in restoration and continuance of his former life estate under the will," with remainder to B. in fee; and by this deed of resettlement persons were appointed to be trustees of the deed of resettlement, and were also thereby expressed to be appointed trustees thereof "for all the purposes of the Settled Land Acts." A. contracted to sell the lands as tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts. Upon objection taken by the purchaser:

Held, that the only settlement under which A. could exercise the statutory power of sale under the Settled Land Acts was the "compound settlement," consisting of the will, the jointure deed, the disentailing deed, and the deed of resettlement; that no trustees of such compound settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts in fact existed; and that unless and until such trustees were appointed or a consent given to have the purchase-money paid into court, the vendor could not make a good title to the purchaser.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, and raised the question whether it was necessary to appoint trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

By the will, dated the 26th of August, 1841, of Mrs. Whitby, certain estates known as the Newlands Manor Estate, were limited to the use of the vendor by his then name of William Cornwallis West for life, with remainder to the use of his first and every son successively in tail male, with remainders over. The vendor was empowered by deed or will to appoint unto any woman whom he might marry a jointure charged on the lands thereby devised in strict settlement.

Mrs. Whitby died on the 5th of August, 1850.

By a settlement dated on the 2nd of October, 1872, made on the marriage of the vendor, he appointed to his wife, if she should survive him, an annual rent-charge, which was charged on the said lands.

On the 15th of November, 1895, the vendor and his eldest son executed a disentailing deed by which the land was conveyed to such uses as the vendor and his son should by deed jointly appoint.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a deed of resettlement of even date (the 15th of November, 1895) the vendor and his son appointed the land devised by the said will to such uses as the vendor and his son should by deed appoint, and subject to such appointment to the use that the vendor's son should receive a yearly rent-charge, and subject thereto to the use of the vendor for his life, in restoration and by way of continuation of the former life estate of the vendor under or by virtue of or with reference to the said will, and from and after the decease of the vendor to the use of the vendor's son, his heirs and assigns, for ever. And the persons who were by this deed of resettlement appointed the trustees of the deed of resettlement were also thereby expressed to be appointed the trustees thereof "for all the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890."

By an agreement in writing dated the 5th of November, 1902, made between the vendor of the one part and E. L. W. Munro, the purchaser, of the other part, the vendor agreed to sell and the purchaser agreed to purchase certain freehold lands situate at Milford-on-Sea, in the county of Southampton, forming part of the settled estate. The vendor purported to be selling as tenant for life under the provisions of the Settled Land Acts.

The purchaser objected to the title on the ground that there were no trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the settlement created by the said will, or of the compound settlement created by the said will and the deeds above mentioned, and required that such trustees should be appointed, and that they should join in the conveyance and give a discharge for the purchase-money.

Upjohn, K.C., and Popham, for the purchaser, contended that the vendor was tenant for life either under the will of the 26th of August, 1841, or all the instruments taken together which formed one compound settlement, and that there were no trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts who could give a discharge for the purchase-money.

They referred to the Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 2, 20, 22, 40; Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 4; In re Marquis of Ailesbury and Lord Iveagh, 41 W. R. 644, [1893] 2 Ch. 345; In re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract, 46 W. R. 523, [1898] 2 Ch. 96; In re Munday and Roper's Contract, 47 W. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275; In re Spencer's Settled Estates, 51 W. R. 262, [1903] 1 Ch. 75.

Butcher, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the vendor, contended that the appointment of trustees was not necessary because there were in fact trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the indenture of the 15th of November, 1895 (the deed of re-settlement), who were competent to give a discharge for the purchase-money. The vendor's wife was willing to join in the conveyance and release her jointure, but the parties did not desire that the purchase-money should be paid into court.

They referred to 3 Davidson's Precedents (3rd ed.), p. 594; Hill v. Pritchard, 2 W. R. 297, Kay 394, In re Wright's Trustees and Marshall, 33 W. R. 804, 28 Ch. D. 93.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said; I think it is sufficient for me to say that in my opinion the life estate is restored—that is to say, the old life estate created by the will of Mrs. Whitby, is still the life estate in existence. That is in accordance with the decision of Pearson, J., in the case of In re Wright's Trustees, approved by Stirling, L.J., in the case of In re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract, and it also accords, in my opinion, with the view expressed by Chitty, L.J., in In re Mundy and Roper's Contract, [1899] 1 Ch., at p. 294, where he says, "the life estate was not in terms limited to him (the life tenant) in restoration of his old life estate. The object of this restoration is well known; it was to keep alive the old powers annexed to the life estate." Having once arrived at that, it seems to me to be clear that in the present case "the settlement" within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts must be the compound settlement consisting of that created by the will, the jointure deed, the disentailing assurance, and the deed of resettlement; and that the tenant for life under this compound settlement is the person to exercise the statutory power given by the Acts. Trustees, however, will have to be appointed of this compound settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, unless the parties are willing that the purchase-money should be paid into court.

REEVE v. SADLER. (a.)

Local government—Nuisance—Notice to abate served on adjoining owners—Intercommunication of drainage system for the two houses—Work to that part of the drain that served both houses done by plaintiff—Claim against defendant for half of the expenses of this work—Rights of parties inter se—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 104.

The plaintiff and the defendant were the owners of adjoining houses which were drained by a system that met under the plaintiff's premises, and from that point the sewage of both houses passed along a single pipe into the main sewer.

Separate notices were served by the local authority on the owners to abate a nuisance on their respective premises. The plaintiff had the necessary work done, including the connecting of the defendant's drain to the common connection with the sewer. This operation benefited the defendant, and the plaintiff claimed to be repaid half the expense of this part of the work.

The county court judge decided that the defendant was not liable.

Held (dismissing the plaintiff's appeal), that there was no legal responsibility on the defendant, either by statute or at common law, to indemnify the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of his Honour Judge Edge, sitting at the Clerkenwell County Court, in favour of the defendant.

The plaintiff and the defendant were the respective owners of two adjoining houses, Nos. 37 and 39, Gurney-street, Stratford.

On the 24th of April, 1902, the plaintiff received notice from the urban authority under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 91, 94, and 95, and the West Ham Corporation Acts, 1893, s. 41, and 1898, s. 42, that they were satisfied of the existence of a nuisance at his premises, 37, Gurney-road, and requiring him within seven days to abate the same, and for that purpose to do certain specified work. This work included making a connection between the drainage of the plaintiff's house and the sewer in the street.

On the 10th of May following a similar notice was served upon the defendant in respect of his premises, No. 39, Gurney-street.

The system by which the plaintiff joined his house drainage with the main sewer lay entirely under his own premises, but the sewage from the defendant's house was carried off by a pipe which was connected with the plaintiff's drain, and from that point the sewage of the two houses was carried off by a single pipe into the main sewer in the street. The plaintiff did the work required to be done by him under the notice from the local authority, including the connecting of the defendant's pipe to that part of the drain that was common to both houses. As these operations benefited the defendant the plaintiff directed his builder to keep separate accounts of the expenses of the work done on the joint sewer and his own separate drain, and claimed from the defendant half of the former costs, which amounted to £12 4s. 3d. The defendant having refused to pay this amount, the plaintiff brought his action in the county court.

At the trial the learned judge held that the defendant was not liable, and the plaintiff appealed.

E. J. Naldrett, for the plaintiff.—The defendant was equally liable to abate the nuisance on his premises as the plaintiff was to do the necessary work in respect of his property, and must have done the very work to the part of the drain used by both which the plaintiff had done. The defendant having therefore benefited by the plaintiff's work, he is liable for half the cost. By the notice to abate having been served on both parties, and the plaintiff having done the work required, the plaintiff is therefore in an analogous position to the sanitary authority under the Public Health Acts, where if work ordered to be done by an owner is not done, they come in and do the work at the owner's expense. The plaintiff is entitled to recover half the expense by virtue of section 104 of the Public Health Act, 1875, because the claim comes within the words "all reasonable costs and expenses incurred in relation to a nuisance under this Act shall be deemed to be money paid for the use and at the request of the person on whom the order is made." The defendant is moreover liable at common law because the structural work done by the plaintiff benefited the defendant and was work which the defendant was under a legal liability to do or have done.

Gebhardt v. Saunders, 40 W. R. 571, [1892] 2 Q. B. 452; North v. Walthamstow Urban Council, [1898] 67 L. J. Q. B. 972; Lancaster v. Barnes District Council, 46 W. R. 623, [1898] 1 Q B. 855, were also cited.

W. M. Hunt, for defendant, was not heard.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., after stating the facts, said: It seems that the drainage of the defendant's house passing through this common drain was carried into the sewer in the street by means of the connection which the plaintiff, in compliance with a notice of the sanitary authority, had made between his house and the sewer. The plaintiff claimed in his action the right to recover from the defendant half the cost of this connection by which the drainage of the defendant's house, as well as that of his own, passed into the sewer in the street. In order to make good such a claim the plaintiff must show that the defendant was under a legal responsibility to do the work cast upon the plaintiff by the order, and to share the burden of a part of the expense. No doubt there are sections in the Public Health Acts authorizing the sanitary authority to enter upon premises and do the necessary work and recover the apportioned expenses from the various occupiers, but so far as we have been told to-day by Mr. Naldrett there is not any section in the public Acts or in the local Acts, nor was he able to cite a case as an authority for his contention that where a person who has incurred expense in the performance of work under a sanitary notice can sue another person for a proportion of such expenses, because and by reason of the fact merely that the sewage from the house of the latter passes through the connecting drain or sewer which the plaintiff had been called upon to make. Whatever the rights of the sanitary authorities may be, they need not be considered by us now, because they have no relation to such a case as the present, where an owner does work for himself, and in doing so benefits his neighbour. There is no statute or rule of common law that can be relied on by the plaintiff here as entitling him to maintain an action to recover expenses so incurred, nor can I see anything to create any legal responsibility on the part of the present defendant. It avails the plaintiff nothing to say that because in other proceedings the defendant might have been compelled to do certain work, therefore he is liable to contribute his proportion of expenses when the work has been done by someone else. That appears to me to decide the present case.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills, Wright, Bruce, and Ridley, JJ.) — Feb. 7.

REX v. JOHN DEAVILLE.
REX v. SIMPSON. (a.)

Criminal law—Gaming—Place used for betting—Bar of public-house—Permission of landlord—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1 and 3.

Where a person is indicted for carrying on betting transactions in the bar or taproom of a public-house, it is necessary, in order to convict him of an offence under the Betting Act, 1853, to produce evidence showing that the landlord permitted him to carry on his betting transactions there. It must be shown that the defendant had something in the nature of a right or license to use the place for the purpose of his betting business over and above the right of an ordinary member of the public to resort thereto.

These three cases were tried before the recorder sitting at the quarter sessions for the borough of Hanley, Staffordshire, and raised the question whether a bookmaker's attendance in the bar or vaults or other public room of a licensed public-house for the purpose of carrying on his business of ready-money betting is a breach of sections 1 and 3 of the Betting Act, 1853.

REX v. ALBERT DEAVILLE.

In this case the indictment charged that the defendant on the 24th of May, 1902, being a person then using a certain licensed beerhouse known by the name of Park Inn, at Hanley, unlawfully did use the said house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto.

Seven following counts charged a similar offence on seven subsequent days.

At the hearing it was proved that the defendant was a bookmaker, and that on each of the days mentioned in the indictment he was in fact for a considerable time in the vaults or an adjacent public room of the Park Inn; and that he there received on each occasion money from persons by way of bets on horses, and that, on several of these occasions, he paid money to persons in respect of winnings on bets made, some or all, in the same place.

No evidence was given that the occupier or his servants saw or knew what was going on.

At the close of the case for the prosecution counsel for the defendant submitted that there was no case for the jury. He contended that the user prohibited by the Betting Act, 1853, was the user of a person having something in the nature of dominion or control over the place, having some right of user peculiar to himself as against others, or at least having the permission or license of the occupier, and he cited Whitehurst v. Fincher, 17 Cox. 70, 38 W. R. Dig. 82; Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., 47 W. R. 585, [1899] A. C. 143, and Belton v. Busby, 47 W. R. 636, [1899] 2 Q. B. 380. In reply Belton v. Busby was relied on as distinguishing Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. from the present case.

The learned recorder refused to withdraw the case from the jury. He directed them in accordance with the case of Reg. v. Worton, [1895] 1 Q. B. 227, 43 W. R. Dig. 69, to consider whether the defendant did in fact use the respective rooms on the days mentioned and, if so, whether he used them for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. He further directed them that a mere casual use of the rooms would not be sufficient, but that if the defendant attended there with the expectation that persons would come to bet with him, and for the purpose of inviting them to do so, and so of carrying on his business as a bookmaker, that would be a breach of the statute; and that no evidence of permission by the occupier was necessary, nor was it necessary that the defendant should have any control, dominion, or right peculiar to himself as against others over the place.

The jury found the defendant guilty on all the counts.

The learned recorder respited judgment until the next sessions in order that the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved might be obtained on the points raised on behalf of the defendant.

Danckwerts, K.C. (G. D. Keogh with him), for the defendant.—In this case the conviction was wrong. There was really no case to go to the jury, and the recorder should have withdrawn it from them. Here the evidence was perfectly neutral. It is not sufficient that there is a mere scintilla of evidence in order that a case may be left to a jury; there must be substantial evidence of guilt; there must be evidence showing that the defendant here did something in the nature of a user of the public-house for the purpose of carrying on his business of a bookmaker. It is not enough to show that he merely went to the house as an ordinary member of the public for the purpose of obtaining refreshment, and that during the time he was there other members of the public made bets with him: see Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. The user referred to in the Betting Act, 1853, involves more than the mere use of a place in common with other persons; it involves the use of such place by a person having some sort of dominion or control over it and possessing some right greater than that possessed by the other persons making use of the place, and unless it be shown that such user is by the license or permission of the occupier no offence is committed contrary to the statute: Downes v. Johnson, 43 W. R. 556, [1895] 2 Q. B. 203; Whitehurst v. Fincher; Hornsby v. Raggett, 40 W. R. 111, [1892] 1 Q. B. 20; Belton v. Busby; Tromans v. Hodkinson, ante, p. 286, [1903] 1 K. B. 30; and Reg. v. Worton.

B. C. Brough, for the prosecution.—The conviction was right and should be upheld. It is not necessary to show that the occupier of the house knew that the defendant was carrying on the betting transactions. In Brown v. Patch, 47 W. R. 623, [1899] 1 Q. B. 892, where the respondent was convicted of using a "place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto" within the meaning of section 1 of the Act, there was no evidence that he had any license from the owner of the grounds where the horse-racing was taking place. In the present case there is a sufficiently definite localization of the betting although there was no authority from the occupier.

REX v. JOHN DEAVILLE.

In this, the second case, the indictment charged that the defendant, on the 24th of May, 1902, and on six several subsequent days in the same year, being the occupier of the Park Inn beerhouse, unlawfully, knowingly, and wilfully did permit the said house to be used for the purpose of Albert Deaville (the person mentioned in the first of these three cases), a person then using the said house, betting with persons resorting thereto. At the hearing it was proved that on each of the said days the said Albert Deaville used the house, of which his father, the defendant in this case, was the occupier, in the manner stated in the previous case, and that on each of these occasions the defendant in this case was present and could see what was going on.

Counsel for the defendant submitted that there was no case for the jury, and contended that no unlawful use by the said Albert Deaville had been proved. He further contended that if no unlawful user were proved against the said Albert Deaville, the defendant John Deaville could not be guilty of permitting such user.

The learned recorder refused to withdraw the case from the jury, and directed them in the same terms as in the previous case, and told them that if they were satisfied that the said Albert Deaville in fact used the house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and that the defendant John Deaville knew of what was going on, and permitted or wilfully suffered it to continue without interference, that would be a breach of the statute.

The jury found the defendant guilty on all the counts.

The learned recorder respited judgment for the same purposes as he did so in the previous case.

G. D. Keogh, for the defendant.—The conviction was wrong. The learned recorder in directing the jury did not point out to them that in order to enable them to convict it must be shown that the user was such as is indicated by the House of Lords in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. Betting is in itself no offence, and betting with persons resorting to a public-house is no offence. In order to sustain a conviction here, it is necessary for the prosecution to show that the public-house was being used as a betting establishment and being so used with the permission of the defendant. There is, however, no evidence that he gave such permission. In Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., Lord Halsbury, L.C., [1899] A. C., at pp. 161 and 162, held that it is not an offence under the Act "to allow persons to assemble for the purpose of betting with each other"; and at p. 195 Lord James of Hereford says: "Doubtless it is proved that betting as alleged systematically took place within the inclosure to the knowledge of the defendants. Is that evidence sufficient to establish an infringement of the Act? In my opinion it is not." In Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, 23 W. R. 547, L. R. 10 Q. B. 102, where it was shown that the appellant knew of what was going on and took no steps to prevent it, he was convicted, but that case was expressly overruled in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—That case does not, however, overrule Shaw v. Morley, 16 W. R. 763, L. R. 3 Ex. 137.] That case is distinguishable from the present one. Assuming there is a "place," there must be something more than a user of and a resorting to that place. There must be evidence of some dedication of the place with the assent of the occupier or licensee. There is no such evidence here.

B. C. Brough, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

REX v. SIMPSON.

In this case the indictment charged that the defendant on the 9th of May, 1902, and on ten subsequent several days in the same year, being a person then using a certain licensed public-house known as the Travellers' Rest, did use the said house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto.

At the hearing the evidence as to the acts and conduct of the defendant was similar in all material points to that produced against the defendant in the previous case of Rex v. Albert Deaville, except that evidence was given that the occupier of the house in this case was present on several of the occasions and could see what was going on, but that no relationship existed between the defendant and the occupier.

On behalf of the defendant it was submitted that there was no case to go to the jury—vide Whitehurst v. Fincher and Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co.

The learned recorder, however, decided to leave the case to the jury.

It was then submitted on behalf of the defendant that if there were any questions at all for the jury they should be as follows:

(1) Was the house used as a betting establishment?

(2) Had the defendant dominion and control over the place for that purpose?

(3) Had he such dominion and control in the character of owner, keeper, occupier, or in some character analogous thereto? And further, counsel requested the learned recorder to direct the jury, in reference to the nature and character of the use, in accordance with the terms of the judgment of Lord Halsbury, L.C., in the aforesaid case of Powell v. Kempton Park Racecouse Co.

The defendant then gave evidence to the effect that he never went to the Travellers' Rest for the purpose of his business of commission agent or bookmaker, but solely for the purpose of obtaining refreshment in the ordinary course, but that he did sometimes make casual bets there.

The learned recorder thereupon directed the jury in the same terms as he used in the previous case of Rex v. Albert Deaville, and he asked them, in case they found the defendant guilty, to say whether the defendant used the place with the knowledge and consent of the landlord.

The jury found the defendant guilty on all the counts, but said that the user was without the full knowledge and consent of the occupier, and that the occupier did not know exactly what was being done.

Counsel for the defendant thereupon submitted that such finding was a verdict of "not guilty," but the learned recorder directed that a verdict of "guilty" should be entered. He however ordered that judgment should be respited until the following sessions for the same reasons as in the two previous cases.

The questions for the opinion of the court now were whether the learned recorder's directions to the jury in the above cases, respectively, were right, and whether he ought to have withdrawn any of them from the jury and have returned a verdict of acquittal.

G. D. Keogh, for the defendant.—[Read the stated case.]

B. C. Brough, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The point raised in the first and third of these cases is substantially the same, but that in the second case is different. I will first of all deal with the first and third cases. I regret that I feel I am obliged to come to the conclusion that the convictions in these two cases cannot be sustained; but I am glad to be able to say that I think that in coming to this conclusion no harm will be done, because the only reason why I have come to that conclusion is that in the first case no evidence was given of a state of facts of which in any case where an offence is committed evidence could undoubtedly be supplied. All that has been found in the first case is that Albert Deaville was a bookmaker, and that on certain days he was for a considerable time in the vaults or an adjacent public room of the inn, and that he there received and paid money in respect of bets. No evidence was given as to whether the occupier of the public-house knew or did not know what was taking place. It seems to me that if evidence is produced showing that there is a practice of betting transactions being carried on continuously for a considerable number of days, and that such practice has been brought to the knowledge of the occupier of the house, it would be a perfectly right thing to direct the jury to find that what was being done was being done by the license and with the permission of the occupier. Mr. Danckwerts has satisfied me that the view I was disposed to take of the case of Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. is too narrow. I had thought that, if it be established that a person was carrying on a betting business in a place, that would be sufficient evidence of an offence within the meaning of the Act, and that it was not necessary to show that the proprietor of the place had given any license or authority. I now think that that view goes too far.

Since the decision in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co there have been three cases which have a material bearing on this matter.

I agree with counsel for the prosecution that if you get a sufficient localization and, therefore, possession of a spot of ground or anything of that kind, the question of the license of the owner or occupier becomes immaterial, because you can regard the person charged as being himself in occupation of the place. That is pointed out in Brown v. Patch. In Belton v. Busby the facts were much like those in the present case, but there in addition it was proved that the bookmaker received slips of paper bearing the name of the horse backed, and that bets were settled over the counter in the saloon, but there was no evidence that the proprietor of the house had any interest in any of the bets. But it was decided in that case that the bookmaker had something in the nature of a right or license to the user of the bar over and above the right of an ordinary customer to resort to the place there in question. That shows that the true inference is that the bookmaker was not using the bar for the purpose of obtaining refreshment, but, with the permission and license of the proprietor, for the purpose of betting. Then when the matter came before us in Tromans v. Hodkinson, I pointed out that where you find a man habitually frequenting the same room or place for the purpose of carrying on there a regular betting business with persons resorting thereto he commits an offence against the Act. In that case the carrying on of the business in the bar or tap-room was pursued under some understanding with the proprietor.

It does seem to me that, assuming that there is a place which is not in law or in fact in the possession for the time being of the person charged, but which is a common place to which persons in general have access for other purposes than betting, it is necessary to have evidence from which the jury can conclude that the proprietor of the place has authorized that to be done which he need not have permitted in view of his own rights over the place. I therefore think that the conviction in the first case cannot be sustained. I do not think this decision will do any harm because in most of these sort of cases the necessary evidence can be supplied.

In the second case—that of John Deaville—it was proved that the defendant allowed Albert Deaville to use the bar, and carry on a betting business, as he was present on each of the occasions and could see what was going on. I therefore come to the conclusion that in this case there was exactly what was pointed out by Grantham, J., in Belton v. Busby, namely, "something in the nature of a right or license to use the bar of the beerhouse for the purpose of his betting business over and above the right of an ordinary member of the public to resort thereto." Simpson's case is practically the same as Albert Deaville's case, because the jury found the defendant guilty, but said that the user was without the full knowledge and consent of the landlord, and that the landlord did not know what was going on.

I am therefore of opinion that the convictions in the first and third cases must be quashed, and the conviction in the second case be sustained.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } Feb. 13, 14.
Admiralty. }

"THE DALLINGTON." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Belgian law.

Article 228 of the Code de Commerce, Livre II., Titre VIII., De L'Abordage, enacts that "if the collision be caused by the default of any person, all the damages are borne by the ship on board of which the default has been committed. The presence of a pilot on board is no defence to this liability." The Court construed that to mean that, whether the pilot is on board or not, it makes no difference as to the responsibility of the owners if damage is caused in consequence of the negligence of those in charge of the ship.

Action. Damage by collision.

The plaintiffs were the Peninsula and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., and were the owners of the steamship Socotra.

The defendants were the Southdown Steamship Co., the owners of The Dallington.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

About 7 a.m. on the 1st of February, 1903, The Socotra, a twin screw steamship of 6,009 tons gross register, was proceeding down the River Scheldt bound from the port of Antwerp for London. The Dallington, a screw steamship of 2,534 tons gross register, was lying at anchor in Austruweel Roads. The Socotra was in charge of a compulsory pilot and had a tug ahead, when she collided with The Dallington. The owners of The Socotra brought an action against the owners of The Dallington, but judgment was given for the defendants, The Socotra being held alone to blame, the fault being that of the pilot.

The question therefore arose as to the liability of the shipowner for damage resulting from the negligent navigation of his vessel whilst in charge of a compulsory pilot in Belgian territorial waters. It was proved by Belgian law that it was obligatory on a vessel such as The Socotra when in the waters in question to take a Government pilot on board, or at least to pay one. The plaintiffs' evidence on the Belgian law was that there was no express provision in the Belgian code by which the pilot was declared not to be in charge, or, in other words, that his duty was restricted to acting as the adviser of the master, but admitted that the shipowner in Belgium could not rely upon pilotage as a defence. The defendants cited article 228 of the Belgian Commercial Code in support of the proposition that though it was obligatory to pay for a pilot, nevertheless the pilot did not supersede the master, but acted only as his adviser, so that the presence of a pilot on board was no defence to the liability of the shipowner for a collision caused by the negligence of those in charge.

Rowlatt and Finlay, for the plaintiffs.—The pilot's presence on board The Socotra was compulsory, at least in the sense that the fees had to be paid, but as a matter of fact the pilot was actually in charge and navigating the vessel. The test of compulsory pilotage was the obligation to pay the pilotage dues. The provision of section 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which enacted that "an owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within a district where the employment of a qualified pilot was compulsory by law," was merely declaratory of the common law, by which liability cannot be entailed for the negligence of a person who was not the servant or agent of the ship.

They cited The Halley, L. R. 2 P. C. 193; The General Steam Navigation Co. v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Co., 17 W. R. 615, L. R. 3 Ex. 330.

Aspinall, K.C., Dawson Miller, and Dunlop, for the defendants.—A distinction is drawn between a pilot being compulsorily in charge so as to supersede the master, as in English law, and being compulsorily on board. By Belgian law the pilot only acts as the adviser of the master, who remains in charge.

They cited The Guy Mannering, 30 W. R. 525, 835, 7 P. D. 52, 132; The Prinz Hendrik, 47 W. R. 183, [1899] P. 177; The Agnes Otto, 35 W. R. 550, 12 P. D. 56; The Augusta, 6 Asp. M. L. C. 161, 35 W. R. Dig. 186.

BUCKNILL, J., in delivering judgment, said the plaintiff's argument shortly comes to saying that because there is an omission, so to speak, or rather no positive declaration in terms by the Belgian law that pilotage is not compulsory in the sense that the pilot is not in charge, I am to assume that it is compulsory in the sense in which they argued. Evidence has been given by two Belgian lawyers, and they both agree that according to their law, to the extent to which it is to be found in terms, the pilot is only an adviser, and the owners of the vessel are responsible for damage done. In this case it may be that the master did hand over the navigation of his ship entirely to the pilot. He stated that in fact he had done so, and that all the orders were given by the pilot and that all those orders were carried out by the crew. So in point of fact the pilot was solely in charge; but, as was said in The Augusta by Esher, M.R., "We are concerned with the law of England, and in an English action. We are bound by the law of France because the law of France establishes what are the circumstances of the appointment of and employment of the pilot." So far as the law of Belgium is in writing it is to be found in article 228 of the code, which is as follows: "If the collision be caused by the default of any person all the damages are borne by the ship on board of which the default has been committed. The presence of a pilot on board is no defence to this liability." It seems to me that it would be difficult in the face of that article, to do other than find that whether the pilot is on board or not makes no difference as to the responsibility of the owners where damage is caused in consequence of the negligence of those in charge of the ship. At any rate, the opinion of the Belgian lawyers is that the owners are responsible because the pilot, although compulsorily in one sense, is not by law compulsorily in charge. According to Belgian law ships must take a pilot, and if they do not take him they must pay his fee, so that when a pilot comes on board the master may say, "You may go away or you may come on board and I will pay your fee, but I do not want you." But pilotage is compulsory in the sense that if the master does not choose to take the pilot he cannot get out of the responsibility of paying the pilot's fee. With regard to the authorities cited during the argument, The Halley is not in point for the reasons given by Esher, M.R., in his judgment in The Augusta, which case, together with The Guy Mannering and The Prinz Hendrik, establish the view I am taking—namely, that according to Belgian law, though a pilotmay be compulsory in the sense that if he is not accepted he must still be paid for, yet he is not a person legally in charge, the result being that, although in point of fact the pilot is navigating and solely in charge, yet if the ship does damage in consequence of negligent navigation, the owners are, according to Belgian law, responsible.

PELHAM-CLINTON v. DUKE OF NEWCASTLE. (a.)

Will — Construction — Estate in special tail — Issue — Gift to A. if he marries a gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their descendants.

A testator willed and bequeathed certain estates to his son Charles, and after providing that his eldest son might redeem those estates, continued: "The proceeds to go with the limitations of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and has issue male, and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over.

Held, that Charles took an estate in special tail male.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 83, [1902] 1 Ch. 34) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ.) (50 W. R. 83, [1902] 1 Ch. 34), affirming the decision of Buckley, J. (49 W. R. 12).

Henry Pelham, fourth Duke of Newcastle, by the fifth codicil, dated the 14th of August, 1846, to his will, dated the 31st of January, 1814, willed and bequeathed to his son Lord Charles Pelham-Clinton certain estates; and after providing that his eldest son, the Earl of Lincoln, might purchase and redeem those estates for certain sums of money, the testator continued: "The proceeds to go with the limitation of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over.

In 1848 Lord Charles Pelham-Clinton married Elizabeth Grant, a fit and worthy gentlewoman, within the meaning of the above limitation.

The fourth duke died on the 12th of January, 1851, and his said will and five codicils thereto were duly proved on the 14th of February, 1852.

In April, 1851, Lord Charles disentailed all the hereditaments by the fifth codicil given to him for any estate in tail male or in tail.

Lord Charles Pelham-Clinton died on the 14th of December, 1894, and the appellant was the eldest son of Lord Charles' marriage with Elizabeth Grant.

The appellant issued the writ in the present action against the respondent, claiming a declaration that upon the true construction of the said fifth codicil to the will of Henry Pelham, fourth Duke of Newcastle, Lord Charles Pelham-Clinton (the plaintiff's father) was only entitled as tenant for life to the estates in such codicil mentioned, and that the plaintiff is now entitled to such estates as tenant in tail male in possession.

Buckley, J., held that the codicil gave Lord Charles an estate in special tail male and dismissed the action, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Warrington, K.C., and A. F. Peterson, for the appellant.

Haldane, K.C., Vaughan Hawkins, and Benn, for the respondent, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It appears to me that this case is entirely free from difficulty, and that the language we have to construe is perfectly clear. If you look at the construction of the will, to suggest any difficulty is to my mind almost an absurdity. It is admitted that almost the same words in another part of the same codicil are intended to point to an estate in special tail male, and we are asked to single out this particular gift as being something different from the others.

I have nothing to add to what Buckley, J., originally said; I am quite satisfied with his judgment, and I move that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I think everything that can be said on this codicil has been said, and very well said, by the learned judges who have given their judgments in the court below. I am quite content to adopt in particular the reasoning of Buckley, J., and Romer, L.J., and I do not share at all in the difficulties that presented themselves to Vaughan Williams, L.J. I think Buckley, J., summed it up very well when he said that it was exactly the same as if the testator had said "to my son Charles and such issue male as he may have by marriage with a fit and worthy gentlewoman." I do not think anyone could suggest that that was not an estate in special tail male.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord DAVEY.—I also am of the same opinion, and, like my noble and learned friends, I really cannot understand the difficulties in the case. It seems to me to be one of the plainest cases for an estate tail that I ever saw or heard. Mr. Warrington endeavoured to say that there was enough in the words to imply an estate for life to Charles; but, as I pointed out to him, supposing it had been expressly given to Charles for life, in my opinion the decision would have been exactly the same as the decision at which we now arrive. Speaking for myself, I am entirely satisfied with the reasons which have been given in the court below.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I concur.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion, and I cannot usefully add anything.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) June 15, 16.

In re WILMER.
MOORE v. WINGFIELD. (a.)

Perpetuity—Remoteness—Devise to son of M. for life with remainders to such son's issue—Son en ventre sa mère—Relation back.

For the purpose of the rule against perpetuities an infant en ventre sa mère is to be treated as a living person, whether such assumption is to the advantage of the infant or not.

A. devised her real estate to trustees upon trust to pay the income to her daughter M. for life, and, after her death, by way of equitable contingent remainders (in the events which happened) to the third son of M., born or to be born, for life, and after his death for his first and other sons successively in order of seniority in tail male. A. died in 1880. S. T., the third son of M., was then en ventre sa mère. He was born in 1881. In 1902 S. T., acting on the assumption that the limitations subsequent to his own life estate were void for remoteness, took out a summons against the trustees of the will for a declaration that, on the true construction of the will, and in the events which had happened, he had, on attaining the age of twenty-one years, become entitled as tenant in tail male in possession to the real estate so devised.

Held, affirming the decision of Buckley, J. (ante, p. 395, [1903] 1 Ch. 874), that the limitations did not transgress the rule against perpetuities, and that the sons of S. T. took valid estates in tail male in remainder.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of Buckley, J. (reported ante, p. 395, [1903] 1 Ch. 874).

The facts are fully set forth in the report of the case in the court below.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Sargant, for the plaintiff, used the same arguments and cited the same cases as in the court below.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Austen Cartmell, for the defendant, the heir-at-law of the testatrix Mrs. Moore, and Warrington, K.C., and S. Dickinson, for the surviving trustees of the will, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after stating the facts, continued: In this case the question is whether for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities a child en ventre sa mère is to be treated as a life in being. The case has been put in two distinct ways. Mr. Buckmaster's argument was based on the suggestion that for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities one ought not to treat a child en ventre sa mère as a living person. Buckley, J., has come to another conclusion. Mr. Sargant does not dispute the conclusion of Buckley, J., as to how one ought to treat a child en ventre sa mère, or the statement of Buckley, J., that, when such a child has been born and proves of the proper sex, there is a relation back. He says that if one takes the will and looks at the devise, then one has got, besides the description of the sons who have been born, a description which has no application to any living person, but a description which might be answered by the birth of a child at a time which had no relation to the death of the testatrix. He says that the rule against perpetuities is infringed because one has no right to turn to the actual facts of the case, but has to consider the possibilities. Buckley, J., begins his judgment with a statement of the law which Mr. Sargant does not quarrel with, and having stated the law in a way which expressly regards a child en ventre sa mère as a living person, he proceeds, ante, p. 396, as follows: "But if it be a correct rule of law that on the child being born on the 7th of February, 1881, and turning out to be a boy, you must refer back that state of facts to the earlier date, that of the death of the testatrix, and say retrospectively that at that earlier date events had so turned out that the rule against perpetuities could not be infringed because there was a child in existence, although en ventre sa mère, who was a male and who was born alive, then of course it cannot be contested but that the limitation is perfectly good." Mr. Buckmaster does not accept that last passage, but I think it is perfectly right. Buckley, J., then takes all the cases and deals with them. The first he takes is Doe v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49, where the question was whether marriage and pregnancy which resulted in birth amounted to the revocation of a will. He goes on to deal with the other cases, and, amongst them, with Long v. Blackall, 7 T. R. 100, which, Mr. Sargant says, is not an authority against him. But, in my opinion, it is an authority against him. The fact that the child in that case was referred to as such is quite immaterial. What the court held was that a child en ventre sa mère was for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities to be treated as a living child from the moment of gestation.

Under the circumstances it is not necessary for me to do more than to say that I agree with the judgment of Buckley, J., and his summing up on p. 399. I do not say, and I do not think the learned judge meant to say, that for every purpose of law a child en ventre sa mère is to be treated as a living person. For example, a child in its mother's womb cannot be murdered. Blackstone, in his Commentaries (Kerr, 4th ed.), vol. 1, p. 101, says: "An infant en ventre sa mère, or in the mother's womb, is supposed in law to be born for many purposes. It is capable of having a legacy or a surrender of a copyhold estate made to it. It may have a guardian assigned to it; and it is enabled to have an estate limited to its use, and to take afterwards by such limitation, as if it were then actually born. And in this point the civil law agrees with ours." And later on, in vol. 2, p. 143, he states the rule in this very case. Most of Mr. Buckmaster's argument went on the assumption that Buckley, J., had said that the rule that a child en ventre sa mère was to be treated as a living person, was applicable to all cases. But on the authorities the rule is manifestly applicable when one has to deal with the rule against perpetuities. As soon as the child is born and its sex satisfies the description, one must retrospectively treat it as being in existence just prior to the death of the testatrix.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will only add a few words. Where a question as to the rule against perpetuities arises on gifts under a will of the kind in this case, I think there is a rule that a child en ventre sa mère subsequently born alive is to be regarded as living at the time of the death of the testator. This rule cannot be disputed where it is for the interest of the child. That being so, it disposes of the present case. The plaintiff is clearly tenant for life, and the question whether or not the subsequent limitations are to be deemed void depends on whether or not the plaintiff was living at the death of the testatrix.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the limitation to the first and other sons of the plaintiff is valid or no. As regards the rule against perpetuities, it has been stated with perfect accuracy by Buckley, J. The first proposition he lays down is that in applying the rule the court must look at events which might happen. The second proposition he lays down is that absolute ownership may be suspended for a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, and that for the purposes of this rule a child en ventre sa mère is treated as a life in being. That statement of the law is in accordance with all the modern text-books. I may cite, for example, Jarman on Wills (4th ed.), pp. 252, 253.

The period to look at is the death of the testatrix. What were the facts at that time? One son had died, there was a second son entitled to the Barne estate, and the mother was pregnant of a third son, the present plaintiff, who was afterwards born alive. How is the rule as to perpetuities to be applied? We have to inquire whether the plaintiff, who under the limitations takes for life, was in existence at the testatrix's death. If he was in existence the subsequent limitations are valid. The answer is that he was in existence, for a child en ventre sa mère is for the purpose of the rule against perpetuities to be treated as a life in being.

Company—Directors—Promoter—Action for fraudulent misrepresentations in prospectus—Contribution from co-director—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 54), s. 5.

By section 5 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, "every person who by reason of his being a director, or named as a director, or as having agreed to become a director, or of his having authorized the issue of the prospectus or notice, has become liable to make any payment under the provisions of this Act, shall be entitled to recover contribution, as in cases of contract, from any other person who, if sued separately, would have been liable to make the same payment."

Held, that this section gives a right of contribution in respect of a claim to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentations in a prospectus of a company inviting persons to subscribe for shares, as well as in respect of a claim to recover damages for an untrue statement in the prospectus apart from fraud.

Action to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentation in the prospectus of a company, called the Gem of Murchison Gold Mines (Limited), whereby the plaintiff was induced to apply for and take 10,000 £1 shares in the company. The defendant, who was a promoter and director of the company, denied that any of the representations in the prospectus were false or fraudulent; and further that, if any of them were untrue, he had reasonable ground for believing them to be true. The defendant obtained leave to issue and serve third party notices upon two persons named Reitlinger and Oppenheim, from whom he claimed to be entitled to contribution under section 5 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, the claim against Reitlinger being as a co-promoter with the plaintiff of the company, and as having with the defendant authorized the issue of the prospectus to the plaintiff, and that against Oppenheim being as a co-director. Oppenheim thereupon applied to Jelf, J., at chambers, to set aside the third party notice and the service thereof upon him upon the ground that section 5 did not give a director, against whom a common law action of deceit was brought, a right of contribution from a co-director. Jelf, J., refused the application, but gave leave to appeal. Oppenheim appealed.

By section 5 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, "every person who by reason of his being a director, or named as a director, or as having agreed to become a director, or of his having authorized the issue of the prospectus or notice, has become liable to make any payment under the provisions of this Act, shall be entitled to recover contribution, as in cases of contract, from any other person who, if sued separately, would have been liable to make the same payment."

Oct. 24.—H. H. Haldinstein, for Oppenheim.—Section 5 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, has not altered the old common law rule laid down in Merryweather v. Nixan, 8 T. R. 186, that there is no contribution between tortfeasors. Betts v. Gibbins, 2 A. & E. 57, and Moxham v. Grant, 48 W. R. 130, [1900] 1 Q. B. 88, showed that there is an exception to that rule where the act is not clearly illegal in itself. In the present case the plaintiff is suing the defendant in a common action of deceit to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentations. There is clearly no right to contribution at common law in such a case, and section 5 of the Act of 1890 has not altered the law in that respect. Section 3 of that Act creates for the first time a liability in a director of a company and other persons for any untrue statement in a prospectus of the company inviting subscriptions for shares unless (inter alia) the director or other person can prove that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, the statement to be true. That section creates a liability for an untrue statement apart from fraud, and section 5 only gives a right of contribution to a person who has become liable to make a payment "under the provisions of this Act." That limits the right of contribution to cases where the liability is created by section 3 of the Act: Lindley on Company Law (6th ed.), p. 123. If that were not so, a fraudulent director might recover contribution over against an innocent co-director. The order of the learned judge was therefore wrong.

Muir Mackenzie, for the defendant.—Section 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, gives a right of action against a director or promoter of a company and against any person who has authorized the issue of the prospectus in respect of any untrue statement in the prospectus, with certain exceptions. That includes a statement that is known to be untrue as well as a statement not known to be untrue. In respect of that cause of action section 5 gives a director or any person who has authorized the issue of the prospectus so becoming liable a right of contribution, as in a case of contract, from any other person who, if sued separately, would have been liable to make the same payment. The order was therefore right.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I have no doubt that the order was perfectly right. The question which we have to decide is whether there can be a right of contribution in this case. To my mind the statute has stated, with what I may, without disrespect, call unusual clearness, that with reference to this particular class of tort, and with reference to this class of persons, the ordinary rule that there shall be no contribution between tortfeasors shall not apply, and that the rights of the parties shall be treated as though it was a question of contract and not of tort at all. The result is that a right of contribution exists, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, M.R., and ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

The action came on for trial before Wills, J., and a special jury, the action as between the plaintiff and the defendant being heard first.

The jury were asked, so far as material to the present report, the following questions: (1) Were any of the statements in the prospectus false to the knowledge of the defendant? and (2) Had such false statements a material effect in inducing the plaintiff to take the shares? The jury answered both these questions in the affirmative, and they assessed the damages at £4,750, and judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for that amount with costs.

The third party proceedings were then heard. With regard to the defendant's claim against Oppenheim, the jury returned a verdict for Oppenheim, and judgment was entered for him as against the defendant. With regard to the defendant's claim against Reitlinger, the jury returned a verdict against Reitlinger on one representation, stating that it was a fraudulent mis-statement and that Reitlinger must have known it. Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendant as against Reitlinger for £2,375, and half the costs of the original action, which the defendant had to pay to the plaintiff and to his own solicitor, together with the costs of the third party proceedings against Reitlinger.

The defendant applied for judgment or a new trial of the action as against him, and Reitlinger made a similar application as to the third party proceedings against him.

June 10.—C. A. Russell, K.C., Muir Mackenzie, and J. A. Simon, for the defendant.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Clavell Salter, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

THE COURT (COLLINS, M.R., and MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.) dismissed the defendant's application, holding that there was evidence to justify the verdict of the jury.

Reitlinger's application then came on for hearing.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Arthur Sims, for Reitlinger.—Section 5 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, does not create any right to recover contribution where the action is a common law action of deceit. It only applies where there is a claim under section 3 of the Act founded upon an innocent misrepresentation apart from fraud. If the section does create a liability to contribute in the case of an action of deceit, a fraudulent director may recover contribution from an innocent director. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—May not the innocent director show that he had reasonable ground for believing, and did believe, that the representation was true?] The decision of this court on the 24th of October last on the appeal from Jelf, J., at chambers is not a decision that a right of contribution between tortfeasors is given by section 5. That decision applied solely to a claim under section 3 of the Act.

C. A. Russell, K.C., Muir Mackenzie, and J. A. Simon, for the defendant, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—The same question which has been raised now has been decided by this court when the Lord Chancellor was presiding over it. We held in an application in this very action that a liability to contribute would arise. According to the verdict of the jury the defendant and Reitlinger were joint tortfeasors, and the latter became liable under the terms of the Act to contribute.

MERCIER v. MERCIER. (a.)

Married woman — Joint account — Purchase out of money belonging to wife—Gift to husband—Resulting trust—Capital—Income.

In the case of the receipt by a husband of the separate property of his wife there is no general rule of law that in the case of corpus belonging to the wife the onus of proof of a gift lies on the husband, while in the case of income the onus lies on the wife, and she must establish clearly and conclusively that her husband received the income by way of loan. For this purpose the difference between capital and income is only one of degree and not of principle.

Alexander v. Barnhill, 21 L. R. Ir. 511, 37 W. R. Dig. 5, discussed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

In 1883 the defendant in the action married Colonel Mercier. At the time of the marriage the defendant was possessed of considerable property, but her husband was not a man of large means. After the marriage a joint account was opened in the names of the husband and wife, on which both drew. In 1891 they bought a piece of land at Bournemouth, on which a house was subsequently built. The conveyance was made to the husband, who paid for the land by a cheque drawn on the joint account. The building was also paid for out of the joint account, though a separate building account was opened. The husband alone drew on this building account. Shortly after the marriage the husband and wife had made wills in each other's favour, but the husband subsequently, without the knowledge of the wife, revoked his will. The husband died in 1901 intestate. The plaintiff was a son of Colonel Mercier by a former marriage, and he now brought the present action as the eldest son and heir-at-law of the intestate, claiming a declaration to the effect that the land at Bournemouth belonged to the husband absolutely. Buckley, J., held that the wife did not intend to make a gift to the husband and that he was a trustee for her.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff appealed.

Butcher, K.C., and E. Ford, for the appellant.—This account was made up of income of the wife's property. Where the corpus of a wife's separate property is received by her husband, the onus of proof lies on him to show that it is a gift, but where income only is received by the husband, the onus lies on the wife, save perhaps as to the last year's income, and she must establish clearly and conclusively that her husband received her income by way of a loan: Alexander v. Barnhill, 21 L. R. Ir. 511, 37 W. R. Dig. 5.

They also referred to Caton v. Rideout, 1 Mac. & G. 599; Edward v. Cheyne (No. 2), 13 A. C. 385, 36 W. R. Dig. 173.

Henry Terrell, K.C., and MacSwinney, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., delivered judgment to the effect that on the evidence and on the facts of the case the inference to be drawn was that it was not intended that there should be a gift to the husband. There was therefore a resulting trust in favour of the wife, and the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J., also held that on the facts there was no gift to the husband, and the appeal failed. His lordship continued: It has been suggested that one presumption arises if the money comes from corpus of the separate property of the wife, and another if it comes from her income. In my opinion, that is not the law, and there is no authority for it. The only thing which lends colour to the suggestion are the observations of Chatterton, V.C., in Alexander v. Barnhill, which have, I think, been misunderstood. I do not think that the Vice-Chancellor intended in that case to lay down any such general proposition as is contended for. There is no such inherent distinction between capital and income. Suppose the wife had a separate account, and, being a wealthy woman, gave her husband a cheque for £5,000. According to the appellant's argument one presumption would arise if her account were at the time made up of capital, and a different presumption if it were made up of income. The only real difference between capital and income is one of degree. In every case where money of the wife comes to the husband, the only question is whether a gift was intended or not. No doubt in certain cases the fact of the money having been income received by the husband with the consent of the wife may be material, but there is no other distinction in law so far as I am aware between income and capital.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the judgment of Buckley, J., and I do not think it is possible to add much to his reasoning. I wish, however, to add this, that I entirely adopt what has fallen from Romer, L.J., with reference to the alleged distinction whether in a case like this the money comes from a banking account consisting solely of income of the wife or from one consisting wholly or partly of capital. To my mind there is no difference in principle, though there may be in the importance to be attached to drawings from the fund; but that is a difference of degree and not of principle.

SAVILE v. DRAX. (a.)

Interest—Charge on land—Order of court—No words charging interest—Interest-bearing debt—Presumption of satisfaction—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), s. 28.

A charge on land created by an instrument or order of the court carries interest, though there are no words in the instrument or order expressly charging interest. If a claim to have money raised and paid out of real estate is not barred by the Statute of Limitations, there is no ground, in the absence of any special circumstances, for raising a presumption of satisfaction.

This was an appeal from a decision of Joyce, J.

In 1814 Richard Erle Drax Grosvenor contracted to purchase an estate known as Hobbys and paid as a deposit £150, part of the purchase-money, but he died before completing the purchase, leaving his only son, Richard Edward Erle Drax, his heir-at-law.

In 1822 Richard Edward Erle Drax was duly found by inquisition to be a lunatic.

In 1823 the committees of the lunatic were authorized to complete the purchase of Hobbys. £1,627 10*s.*, the balance of the purchase-money, was paid by them out of the rents and profits of the real estates of the lunatic, and by an indenture of release of the 28th of April, 1824 (which was approved by the court) Hobbys was conveyed to trustees in trust for the lunatic, his heirs and assigns.

The said indenture contained the following proviso: "Provided always and it is hereby declared that the sum of £1,627 10*s.* so paid by the said Thomas Grosvenor and Robert Grosvenor, the committees of the estate of the said Richard Edward Erle Drax shall be a lien upon 'the property conveyed' in trust for the said Richard Edward Erle Drax, his executors or administrators."

By an indenture of conveyance dated the 15th of December, 1826, after reciting that the court had approved the contract for the purchase by the committees of the land thereby conveyed for £500, and for payment of the purchase-money out of the rents and profits of the lunatic's estate but that the money to be applied in the purchase should be applied without prejudice to any question which might arise upon the death of the lunatic as to whether the same was real or personal estate of the lunatic, a piece of land at Morden, in the county of Dorset, was conveyed to trustees in trust for the lunatic, his heirs and assigns. And in pursuance of the order of court in that behalf it was thereby declared that the sum of £500 paid for the purchase-money had been so paid and applied without prejudice to any question which might arise upon the death of the lunatic as to whether the same sum of £500 might be real or personal estate of the lunatic.

The lunatic died on the 18th of August, 1828, a bachelor and intestate, leaving his sister, Jane Frances, the wife of John Erle Drax, his heiress-at-law and only next-of-kin. On the 19th of September, 1828, letters of administration to the personal estate of the lunatic were duly granted to Jane Frances Erle Drax.

Jane Frances Erle Drax died on the 25th of September, 1853, leaving her two daughters, Maria Caroline Erle Drax, and the defendant, Sarah Charlotte Erle Drax, her coheiresses-at-law. By her will she gave all her real and personal estate to her husband, John Erle Drax, but such will was inoperative as regarded personal estate not being her separate estate.

On the 24th of May, 1882, letters of administration of the personal estate of the lunatic were granted to John Erle Drax.

John Erle Drax died on the 5th of January, 1887.

The plaintiffs, who were his executors, took out the present summons asking (among other things) for a declaration that they were entitled to a lien upon Hobbys for £1,627 10s. with interest thereon from the date of the death of John Erle Drax, and also to a lien on the Morden property for £500 with interest thereon from the same date and to have such liens enforced by foreclosure or sale.

Joyce, J., made the declarations asked for.

The defendants appealed.

Badcock, K.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.—On the death of the lunatic, Mrs. Drax became entitled both to the land and to the charge upon it. It is submitted that the charge thereupon became merged. If it did not merge it is barred under the Statute of Limitations. No proceedings were ever taken to enforce the charge. The argument that it was the same hand to receive and to pay here carries no weight because the charge is not one that bears interest at all. There are no words charging the land with interest. In the case of Hobbys the principal only, is a lien on the land. As to the Morden property, that is not charged even with principal.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument: Page v. Newman, 9 B. & C. 378; London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. v. South-Eastern Railway Co., [1893] A. C. 429; Lippard v. Ricketts, 20 W. R. 898, L. R. 14 Eq. 291; Eardley v. Knight, 37 W. R. 704, 41 Ch. D. 537; Thompson v. Drew, 20 Beav. 49, 4 W. R. Ch. Hughes, K.C., Theobald, K.C., Davenport, and L. F. Potts, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R., stated the facts, and continued: Two points have been taken for the appellants. First, it is said that the right to the money as personal property and the right to the land became merged in the same person, and that, therefore, the lien is gone. Now, the lunatic died leaving his sister his heiress-at-law and sole next-of-kin. But the sister was married, and therefore the right with regard to the money, which was the wife's chose in action, and the right with regard to the land never coalesced in the same person. Consequently there could be no merger either at law or in equity. The sister died leaving a husband, who then became tenant by the courtesy of the land, and he was in the enjoyment of it until his death in 1887. Clearly there was no merger up to that date. Then counsel fall back upon the Statute of Limitations and say that as no interest was ever paid upon this charge there was no intention to keep the principal sum alive. If interest was payable, of course counsel are met by the difficulty that up to 1887 the obligation to pay and the right to receive were united in the same person, and therefore the statute was not running up to that year, while it has been agreed between the parties that the lapse of time since 1887 is not to be taken into account. Therefore we come to this point—whether as the result of the charge, interest was or was not payable; and this appears to me to be the only point in the case.

It seems to me well established on the authorities that a court of equity has power to allow interest, and in point of fact does so when a charge is created on land, although no words directly charging interest are contained in the instrument creating the charge. Indeed, we go back to the principle laid down in many cases showing that in point of fact the court of equity does charge interest. Many cases to that effect have been cited in the course of the argument, but it is not necessary to go through them; it is in fact admitted that the court has power to charge interest; but counsel for the appellants say that although the court has power to charge interest yet the circumstances of the particular case may lead it to consider that it ought not to order or enforce payment of interest. But in the present case it appears to me—and the learned judge has so held—that the circumstances, instead of rebutting the presumption that interest was payable, assist it, because this special provision was made in order to safeguard the right of the persons entitled to the lunatic's personal estate as against the right of the persons entitled to the land and to adjust those rights between them. What was the object of this but to give to those representing the personal estate as against those representing the land the right to have the charge paid? In my opinion, therefore, it is peculiarly a case in which the court ought to follow its well-settled practice. Accordingly there must be a declaration that interest is payable on the charge. The appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the property purchased, and which was conveyed by the deed of the 28th of April, 1824, in my opinion there can be no question but that the provision as to lien inserted in the deed was so inserted to save the rights of those persons who should be interested in the personal estate of the lunatic at his death as against those who should be interested in his real estate, in case they happened to be different persons. That seems clear from the words of the declaration of the lien in the conveyance. The object and intention, to my mind, are clear, that if the persons entitled to the real estate at the death of the lunatic were not the same as the persons entitled to the personal estate, then the former were to recoup to the latter the money spent in acquiring the land. Accordingly in the deed of 1824 we find a declaration that on the death of the lunatic a fixed sum should be recouped from the realty to the personalty in the events which happened. With regard to the conveyance of 1826, I think that there can be no real doubt but that it was intended to keep alive the rights of the persons interested in the personal estate so far as the money applied in the purchase of the land was personal estate.

Now I take it to be settled at the present day that if you find in any settlement or contract a provision that a sum of money is to be charged on land, and the money is to be paid at a fixed time, the sum itself [illegible] fixed, then as between the owner of the land [illegible] the person entitled to the money although [illegible]ng is said in the settlement or contract as [illegible]terest in the eye of a court of equity from the [illegible]ixed for payment of the money, that money [illegible]nterest. There might be, no doubt, circum- [illegible] so strong as to negative the presumption that [illegible] was payable—there are none such here—but [illegible]ave stated is the rule, and it is illustrated by [illegible]n the security of a memorandum of deposit of title deeds of lands. There the money so charged bears interest, whether there is an express provision for payment of interest or not. So in the case of portions raisable out of land at a fixed time and to a fixed amount they certainly bear interest. So also legacies charged on land, which stand on a different footing from legacies not so charged, carry interest from the death.

Now, the circumstances of the present case, so far from being such as to induce the court to treat this case as an exception to the rule, show strongly that the rule ought to be applied, because the express object of what was done in this case was to allow the rights to the real and personal estate of the lunatic to be adjusted at his death. Therefore the case clearly falls within the general rule, and interest is payable from the death. The facts of this case show that there has been no merger either at law or in equity, and that there is no bar to the claim by reason of the Statute of Limitations.

It was said that owing to the lapse of time there must be a presumption of satisfaction of the charge, but I am convinced that this cannot be so. There is nothing showing any intention on the part of any of the parties interested that the charge should be treated as satisfied, and I am fortified in that view by the case of In re Dixon, 48 W. R. 665, [1900] 2 Ch. 561. It appears to me that in a case like this, where you cannot establish from the Statute of Limitations that a claim to have money paid out of real estate is barred, you ought not to raise the presumption of satisfaction by the application of any general rule. If the statute does not apply at all, you cannot fall back on any general rule. In my opinion the circumstances here are not such as to justify the court in holding that the amount secured can be presumed to have been discharged by lapse of time. It was admitted before us that this case is to be decided as if it had arisen for decision in 1887.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As I understand the judgment of the learned judge below, he thought there was a legal merger, but no merger in equity; but it appears to me that there is not any moment of time at which it can truly be said that there was any merger either at law or in equity.

A more difficult question arises under the Statute of Limitations, and that arises on the answer to be given to the question whether the sum ordered by the court in lunacy to be charged on the land purchased, for the purpose of recouping the lunatic's personal estate, did or did not carry interest from the death of the lunatic, which happened in 1828, having regard to the fact that until 1887 the hand to pay and the hand to receive the interest (if payable) was the same.

It is well settled that where you have an equitable charge on land to secure the payment of a debt, it carries interest, although there is no mention of interest in the instrument of charge. That is established by Ex parte Hirtzel, 3 De G. & J. 464, and by In re Kerr's Policy where James, V.C., said, in giving judgment, "I think that a deposit of title-deeds to secure a loan is to be considered as an agreement to execute mortgage of the property comprised in the deeds, with interest." It is equally well settled in the case of a portion that, although no mention is made of interest, yet it is a charge which carries interest, and interest at the rate current in the country in which the land charged is situate. For that Balfour v. Cooper, 31 W. R. 569, is a clear authority. There are many other cases of equitable lien or charge in which the court has given interest, though not mentioned. I am not aware of any case in which the Court of Chancery, while decreeing an equitable charge or lien, has refused to give interest thereon, and I think the view taken by Bacon, V.C., in Lippard v. Ricketts is the correct one. There he says: "In the case of In re Kerr's Policy the court seems to have proceeded on the theory that a debt secured by equitable mortgage will, unless something is said or may be implied to the contrary, carry interest; and it seems to follow that, when the court has once decided that there is a charge, the sum charged must bear interest." Lippard v. Ricketts was a case in which a person had a charge, not by a mortgage deed bearing interest, but by an order of the court which said nothing about interest. The case was one in which it would have been very easy to hold that interest was payable if it had been one of an ordinary mortgage carrying interest, but it was not: it was a case in which a person had obtained an order giving him a charge upon certain real and personal estate comprised in an annuity deed. Bacon, V.C., held that inasmuch as a charge had been created by the order, that charge must bear interest. Whether the Vice-Chancellor's statement of the law is exhaustive or not, it is not necessary now to consider, but, speaking for myself, I am not prepared to make an exception to the general rule in the present case. This money became payable at the lunatic's death, and it was the intention of the parties that it should be paid out of the land purchased. In my opinion the court would not be giving proper effect to that intention if it refused to allow interest on the sum charged from the time at which the principal sum became payable—that is to say, from the death of the lunatic. I therefore agree that this appeal fails.

In re BARONESS LLANOVER.
HERBERT v. FRESHFIELD. (No. 2). (a.)

Will—Direction for accumulation of rents and profits—Purchase of land—Accumulations Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 58).

A testatrix, who died on the 17*th of January,* 1896, by her will made in 1889, directed that the residue of her property (which consisted largely of surplus rents and profits of landed estate) should be applied to the discharge of incumbrances and the purchase of other landed estate.

Held, that this direction was in contravention of the Accumulations Act, 1892.

Augusta, Baroness Llanover, by her will, dated the 16th of August, 1889, and by subsequent codicils, the last of which was dated the 14th of March, 1892, made certain provisions for her daughter, the plaintiff in the summons.

The testatrix died on the 17th of January, 1896, and her will was duly proved.

By her will she devised her estates to trustees, with full powers of management and leasing, and directed them, after making certain allowances for the plaintiff, to pay the expenses of management and keep down the interest on all incumbrances on the estates out of the rents and profits of the said estate, and she further directed them to apply the surplus rents and profits during the life of the plaintiff, but not for a period of more than twenty years after the death of the testatrix in manner directed concerning the proceeds of her residuary property.

Clause 10 of the will read as follows: "I give the residue of my property not disposed of by any codicil hereto to my trustees in trust to realize the same and apply the proceeds in the discharge of incumbrances on the estates hereinbefore devised or in the purchase of other estates near the devised Llanover estates, and to be held on like trusts and subject to like powers and directions as the said last-mentioned estate."

This clause was said to be in contravention of the Accumulations Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 58), by section 1 of which "no person shall after the passing of this Act settle or dispose of any property in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or income thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated for the purchase of land only for any longer period than during the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who under the uses or trusts of the instrument directing such accumulation would for the time being, if of full age, be entitled to receive the rents, issues, profits, or income so directed to be accumulated." The plaintiff claimed that she was entitled to the surplus rents and profits of the estates devised by the will of the testatrix from the date upon which the trustees first had in their hands or under their control funds sufficient and available for the discharge of a mortgage which she alleged was the only remaining incumbrance upon the estate.

The Accumulation Act became law on the 28th of June, 1892, a short time after the date of the last codicil to the will.

Warmington, K.C., and Fellowes, for plaintiff.—There is no question of accumulation during a minority in this case, therefore the general prohibition in the Act takes effect: In re Clutterbuck, Fellowes v. Fellowes, 49 W. R. 583, [1901] 2 Ch. 285.

Upjohn, K.C., and Howard Wright, for defendants.—The Act is not retrospective and even if it is retrospective, the present case is not one of accumulation for the "purchase of land only." The Act does not apply as long as the mortgage is in existence.

J. I. Stirling, for other defendants.

FARWELL, J.—I am of opinion that the Accumulations Act, 1892, applies to the will of a testator made before the passing of the Act where the testator died after the passing of the Act. The Act was passed for the purpose of qualifying generally the power of accumulation left to testators and settlors after the general purpose of restraining had been carried out by the Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98). The latter Act allowed four periods of accumulation, and the Accumulations Act, 1892, qualifies those periods as far as the purchase of land is concerned. Now, on the construction of the Act of 1892 it is plain that a testator does not settle or dispose of any property except by will and death. Lord Davey in Beddington v. Baumann, ante, p. 383, [1903] App. Cas. 13, stated "The will was an ambulatory document having no force or effect whatever until the death of the gentleman who made the will." An effectual disposition only takes place when the will and the death of the testator coalesce. The Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 24, makes the will speak from the death of the testator. It is my opinion that the Accumulations Act, 1892, does apply to the present will.

Then it is said that the Act cannot apply because the will directs not only the purchase of land, but the discharge of incumbrances, and the payment off of incumbrances is not a purchase of land. That does not mean that you can evade the Act by putting in additional words to which the Act does not apply; but you must omit the words in paragraph 10 of the the will which are inconsistent with the Act of 1892.

Action.

On the 30th of December, 1899, the defendant Hobbs, who was the owner of two houses fronting to Chapel-street, Petersfield, sold one of the houses to the plaintiffs, the International Tea Stores Co. (Limited). This house had been for some years previously occupied by the plaintiffs as assignees of a lease. The other house was occupied by the defendant.

The house sold was conveyed to the plaintiffs by the description of "All that piece or parcel of land situate at Petersfield, in the county of Southampton, and more particularly described in the map or plan drawn in the margin hereof and therein coloured pink, and which piece of land intended to be hereby conveyed has a frontage of twenty-six feet or thereabouts to Chapel-street, and abuts thereon towards the west, and is bounded to the north by a roadway constructed over a brook or stream leading to a yard and blacksmith's shop of the defendant, and towards the east and south (as therein mentioned), together with the messuage or dwelling-house, shop and premises erected and built on the said piece of land, all which said premises are now in the occupation of the company."

The said roadway constructed over a brook was in fact part of the yard belonging to the premises of the defendant, on which he carried on the business of blacksmith, and there was a door, at the back of the premises sold to the plaintiff company, which opened into the yard.

The plaintiff company claimed a right of way over the yard to the door at the back of their premises on the ground that it was enjoyed at the time of the conveyance, and therefore passed under the general words incorporated in the deed by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and sought to restrain the defendant from obstructing the way.

The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 6 (1), provides: "A conveyance shall be deemed to include and shall by virtue of this Act operate to convey, with the land, all buildings, erections, . . . ways, privileges, easements, rights and advantages whatsoever, appertaining or reputed to appertain to the land, or any part thereof, or at the time of conveyance demised, occupied, or enjoyed with, or reputed or known as part or parcel of or appurtenant to the land or any part thereof."

Lord Coleridge, K.C., and Adams, for the defendant.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, continued: I find that there was a way used in fact by the plaintiff company at the date of the conveyance and for many years previously. But then it is urged by counsel for the defendant that the use was wholly permissive. Cases of the sort I am dealing with arise necessarily where the defendant was the owner of the property which has been conveyed to the plaintiff in the action, and is also the owner of other property adjoining, which he does not convey, and over which there is claimed a right of light, or way, or whatever other right it may be. If the defendant himself has been in occupation as well as owner no question of precariousness can arise in any way. In that case the single question would be, Was there a roadway over the tenement retained which was in fact used at the date of the conveyance for the benefit of the tenement sold? This is a different case; for here, although there was unity of title to the two tenements in the defendant, there was not unity of possession, because the plaintiff company were themselves tenants in possession of the tenement sold. The user of the road by them was, of course, not of right. Probably no question would have arisen if they had had the right under the lease; but I have found they had no such right under the lease. They must therefore have used the road either by license or without license. Unless I am prepared to say that in no case can a tenant who has enjoyed in fact a right of way over a made roadway to his tenement obtain, under section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the right of way, because he has not had it as of right unless he has enjoyed it in some way or other as of right, it appears to me that I must hold in this case that the fact of license or no license makes no difference. In every case of this sort the use of the road must be either licensed or unlicensed. If it be unlicensed, it is perfectly open to the owner to say, "True you have used the road; but your use was precarious, because I could any day have stopped it." If, on the other hand, the use be by license, it is still open to the licensor to object that the user was equally precarious, in the sense that the license, being ex hypothesi a revocable one, might have been revoked at any time; though if there be degrees of precariousness, the licensed use is perhaps less precarious than the unlicensed. But, in my opinion, precariousness has nothing to do with cases of this sort, where there is a privilege which is by its nature known to the law—namely, a right of way which has been in fact enjoyed.

The argument of counsel for the defendant as touching precariousness was, I think, founded upon what I venture to believe was a misconstruction of a judgment of mine in Burrows v. Lang, 49 W. R. 564, [1901] 2 Ch. 502, where I was using the argument of precariousness to show that the right there claimed was one that was unknown to the law—namely, the right to take water if and whenever the defendant chose to put water into a particular pond. That is a sort of right which by reason of its precariousness does not exist at all: but a right of way, of course, is a matter well known to the law. The real truth is that you need not consider, in a case of this sort, the question of the title to the existing use—that you need not consider whether it was by license or not. The single question that has to be considered is the question of user in fact. If you find that the way has in fact been used, that is all you have to consider, and not the title under which it has been used. I quite agree that you have to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and you might possibly find cases where a contract, or something of that sort, would prevent the way claimed from passing under the general words imported by section 6. Considerations such as were referred to in Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295, would, I think, be properly taken into consideration in the case of a right of way, as well as in the case of a right of light. I am not sure whether the Court of Appeal in Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross intended to decide that case on section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. I incline to think that the case was not decided on that section; but I anyhow think that the statement of Cotton, L.J., had reference to that section, so that I have at any rate an obiter dictum to assist me in construing that section. I do not, however, in the present case find any special circumstances, such as those that arose in Birmingham, Dudley, and District Banking Co. v. Ross, which would prevent the way claimed from passing by virtue of section 6. As already indicated, the circumstance that the way has been in fact used is, in the present case, quite sufficient.

With regard to this question of license or no license being material I have the assistance of a decision exactly in point in Kay v. Oxley, from which it appears that it is not material. Blackburn, J., says: "I do not think it necessary to consider whether or not that parol license, which was given by the defendant, to use the road was revocable; or whether an action might not have been maintained for obstructing the tenant in doing that which he had a parol license to do; or whether an action for trespass could have been brought against the tenant for using that road. I do not think it material to decide that.

The license was not in fact revoked." The learned judge, therefore, as I understand him, considers the relevant question as this: Was the way in fact enjoyed at the date of the conveyance? If so, the fact that it was enjoyed under a license which had not been revoked was immaterial. If it had been enjoyed in fact, without any license at all, for a number of years, even though no prescriptive right had been, or would have been acquired, yet it would still have been in fact enjoyed. It is in each case a question of fact to be determined on the circumstances of the case, whether a use has or has not been enjoyed within the meaning of section 6. That really disposes of the case, and I must make a declaration that the plaintiff company are entitled to the limited easement asked for.

I wish to deal, however, with another point of view. Some of the cases referred to, such as Barkshire v. Grubb, 29 W. R. 929, 18 Ch. D. 616, turn in a great measure on the fact that there is a made roadway leading to the plaintiffs' premises. In this particular case there was a made way; and, in my opinion, on the authority of Roberts v. Karr, 1 Taunt. 495, to which I referred during the course of argument, the fact that the conveyance states that the property is bounded by the roadway leading to the yard, estops the defendant from saying that there is not in fact a roadway constructed and leading to the yard which necessarily passes the door, that as a matter of fact exists in the wall opening on to the yard.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. (LIMITED) v. MAYOR, &c., OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL. (a.)

Telegraph — Telephone company — Licence to provide telephonic communication in exchange area — New licence to local authority in respect of same area — Continuance of powers to lay down underground wires acquired by company by agreement with local authority — "For the duration thereof" — Telegraph Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 38), s. 3 (1).

Section 3 (1) of the Telegraph Act, 1899—which provides, under certain circumstances, for the continuance of powers acquired by an existing company by agreement with the local authority before the passing of the Act to lay down underground wires in an exchange area, in the event of a new licence being granted to the local authority or to another company in respect of the same exchange area—applies only to the case where the powers of the company are in existence at the date of the grant of the new licence. Accordingly, where the local authority by virtue of a clause contained in the agreement conferring the powers, has duly determined those powers before the date of the grant of the new licence, the section does not operate to continue them.

The words in the section, "those powers shall continue for the period specified in the new licence for the duration thereof," refer to the duration of the powers, and not to the duration of the new licence.

Assuming, therefore, that the powers of the company are in existence at the date of the grant of the new licence, they will be continued, not during the duration of the new licence, but during the period (if any) which the new licence specifies for their continuance.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action with witnesses.

The substantial question raised in this action was whether there is anything in section 3 of the Telegraph Act, 1899, which prevents a local authority, desirous of obtaining a licence to establish a telephone system in its area, from exercising any right, which it may otherwise possess, of determining the powers of a telephone company to lay down and continue underground wires within the area.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment:

By the Telegraph Act, 1863, s. 6, authority was given to certain companies to place and maintain telegraphs under any street or public road, subject to the restriction, contained in section 9, that they should not do so within the district of any city or municipal borough or town having a population of 30,000 inhabitants or upwards, except with the consent of the bodies having the control of the streets. By the same Act a certain authority was also given to construct telegraphs over or across streets. That Act applied only to companies authorized by special Act, and the plaintiff company is not such a company.

By the Telegraph Act, 1868, authority was given to the Postmaster-General to work telegraphs in connection with the Post Office. That was done by section 2 of the Act of 1868 by including the Postmaster-General within the term "the company" in the Telegraph Act, 1863. The Postmaster-General thus acquired the power, in section 6 of the Act of 1863, to lay telegraphs under streets, but subject to the restriction of section 9, which required the consent of the road authority. The Postmaster-General was, by section 4 of the Act of 1868, authorized to purchase telegraph undertakings, and by section 14 to lease them.

By the Telegraph Act, 1869, s. 4, the Postmaster-General obtained a monopoly in the transmission of telegrams, except as by that Act provided, and "telegraph" and "telegram" were by section 3 so defined as to include telephonic communication. The result was that before and in 1884 the Postmaster-General had, as regards underground telephonic communication, the powers given by the Telegraph Act, 1863, and for that purpose had to obtain the consent of the road authority; and he had a monopoly and the power to grant licences.

On the 29th of November, 1884, by a deed made between the Postmaster-General and the plaintiff company, the Postmaster-General, in exercise of those powers, granted to the company for thirty-one years, expiring on the 31st of December, 1911, a licence and permission to work and use telephones. Under that authority the plaintiff company laid down trunk and other lines, and established telephonic undertakings.

By the Telegraph Act, 1892, s. 5 (1), authority was given to the Postmaster-General to authorize his licensees, during the time and within the area specified in the licence, to exercise the powers conferred on the Postmaster-General by the Telegraph Acts, 1863 and 1878, or any of them, and thereupon the enactments conferring those powers were to apply; but this was made subject to a proviso contained in section 5 (2) (b) that the licensees should not exercise those powers without the consent of the urban sanitary authority, and should be subject to any terms and conditions which the urban sanitary authority might attach to such consent. A person, therefore, who received from the Postmaster-General under this Act (1892) an authority to exercise the power in the Act of 1863 to lay underground wires was subject to section 9 of the Act of 1863 as to the consent of the road authority, and to section 5 (2) (b) of the Act of 1892 as to the consent of the like authority; and to this latter consent that authority could attach any terms and conditions.

On the 25th of March, 1896, by a deed made between the Postmaster-General and the plaintiff company, the company sold to the Postmaster-General its trunk lines (article 2), and was confined, as regards its telephonic business, to exchange areas (article 4); and by article 11 the Postmaster-General bound himself from time to time, at the request of the company, to authorize the company to exercise within any exchange area all the powers of executing works conferred upon the Postmaster-General by, inter alia, the Telegraph Act, 1863, subject to a proviso that, in exercising such powers, the company should be subject to the restrictions contained in the Acts, including section 5 of the Telegraph Act, 1892.

The result so far, therefore, was that the Postmaster-General had consented, or bound himself to consent, to the company being authorized to exercise the power in section 6 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, subject necessarily to section 9 of the same Act, and subject also to section 5 of the Act of 1892. Before acting on the authority it remained for the company to obtain the necessary consents from the urban sanitary authority, which was in this case the corporation of Kingston-upon-Hull.

In this state of things an agreement was, on the 10th of November, 1897, made between the company and the corporation, and by article 1 of that agreement the corporation consented to the company exercising such of the Postmaster-General's powers as the company might be licensed to exercise under the Telegraph Act, 1892, but subject to a proviso that, as regards underground works, the company should not execute such works without first applying to the corporation for their consent. The result, therefore, was that the company had obtained the corporation's consent as to overhead works, but required a further consent as regards underground works.

By a further agreement, made on the 18th of March, 1899, between the corporation and the company, the corporation granted to the company, as licensees of the Postmaster-General and subject to the terms and conditions thereafter appearing, leave and licence to lay down certain underground works; and, by article 20, it was provided that the corporation might, after passing a special resolution and hearing the company if the company required to be heard, at any time determine that agreement by a six months' notice in writing, and that upon the expiration of that notice the company should withdraw and remove the wires.

His lordship was of opinion that the power of determination could rightly be imposed as a term and condition under section 5 (2) (b) of the Act of 1892.

On the 23rd of March, 1899, the Postmaster-General, under section 5 of the Act of 1892 and in accordance with clause 11 of the deed of the 25th of March, 1896, authorized the company to exercise within this urban district the powers of executing works conferred upon the Postmaster-General by, amongst others, the Act of 1863, subject to a proviso that that authority was given subject to the conditions in clause 11 of the deed of 1896, and all other provisions of that deed, and to the provisions of the Telegraph Acts, 1863 to 1897.

Under the authority of the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, and the licence of the 23rd of March, 1899, the company, between March and August, 1899, laid down a large number of underground pipes in Hull.

In August, 1899, the Bill which subsequently became the Telegraph Act, 1899, was passing through Parliament, and was approaching its final stage. The corporation (unnecessarily as it seemed to his lordship) were alarmed by a clause which it was at a late moment proposed to introduce, and which became section 3 of that Act. Apparently they thought that if the Act passed without their giving a notice to determine under article 20 of the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, they would have no subsequent power of determination. Accordingly, on the 28th of July, 1899, they gave the company notice that a special resolution would be moved, on the 3rd of August, that in exercise of the power contained in article 20, six months' notice of determination be given.

That notice reached the company on the 29th of July, which was a Saturday. On the 1st of August, which was a Tuesday, the general manager of the company telegraphed asking for a postponement. The corporation declined to postpone, and on the 3rd of August passed the resolution. It would have been possible, though not convenient, to have convened a meeting of the company's board in the interval. A board meeting was not convened, but two directors and the general manager of the company attended on the 3rd of August. They stated that they simply were present individually, and were not in a position to discuss the matter from the company's point of view; but in point of fact they were heard at length and subsequently the motion was passed on the 4th of August. Six months' notice of determination was accordingly given.

On the 9th of August, 1899, the Telegraph Act was passed, and the relevant section contained in it is section 3.

The corporation did not, in fact, enforce against the company the removal of the underground works, but on the 23rd of February, 1900, they wrote that from the expiration of the notice of the 4th of August, 1899, the underground works could remain on sufferance only. Nothing further was done until the 8th of August, 1902. On that date the Postmaster-General granted a licence to the corporation. That licence contained nothing specifying any period for the duration of the powers contained in the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899. It was, in fact, wholly silent on the subject.

The Postmaster-General certified, in the language of section 3 (1) of the Act of 1899, that it was proved to his satisfaction that the company had incurred expenditure in laying down underground wires.

Section 3 (1) is, so far as it is material, as follows: "Where an existing company have before the passing of this Act, under a licence from the Postmaster-General, provided a system of public telephonic communication in any exchange area, and it is proposed to grant a new licence to a local authority or to another company to provide public telephonic communication in the same exchange area, or any part thereof, then [provided the existing company consents (as did the plaintiff company) to two conditions being inserted in their licence] it shall be a condition of the grant of the new licence that where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General that the existing company have incurred or contracted to incur, in the area specified in the new licence, material expenditure in laying down underground wires, and have by agreement with any local authority within that area acquired powers for that purpose, those powers shall continue for the period specified in the new licence for the duration thereof, but, subject as aforesaid, on the terms and conditions specified in the agreement (including any provisions thereof for determination on breach of covenant), except so far as they may be varied by any subsequent agreement with the local authority."

In the present action the plaintiff company claimed declarations (1) that they had by agreement with the defendants acquired powers under section 3, and that such powers were by the section continued and were in operation until the 31st of December, 1911, the date specified in the new licence to the defendants; and (2) that the notice of determination given by the defendants was inoperative. They also sought to restrain the defendants from removing the underground wires.

Haldane, K.C., Astbury, K.C., Forbes Lankester, and H. H. Gaine, for the plaintiff company.—The company at the date of the passing of the Act was an existing company and was providing telephonic communication in Hull; since all the conditions mentioned in section 3 have been complied with, the company is protected, and the result is that the powers of laying underground wires which it had acquired by the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, and which had been revocable, became irrevocable during the period of any new licence which the defendants might obtain. Secondly, the notice to determine the agreement was invalid, because the company were not given an opportunity of being heard under article 20 of that agreement.

Danckwerts, K.C., Buckmaster, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendants.—The defendants were entitled to annex to their consent to the underground wires a provision entitling them to withdraw their consent. They did withdraw their consent, and thereupon the powers of the company to continue underground wires came to an end. At the date of the new licence, therefore, there were no powers on which section 3 could operate. Again, the words in the section, "for the duration thereof," mean "for the duration of the licence"; and inasmuch as there is no period specified in the new licence during which the powers of the company are to continue, it follows that the section is not applicable. The company was heard through its agents, and the notice to determine is therefore valid.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts, and continued: Under the above circumstances two questions arise for decision—first, whether article 20 of the agreement of the 18th of March, 1899, has been complied with; and, secondly, if it has, then what is the result, having regard to section 3 of the Act of 1899?

Upon the first point I am of opinion that article 20 has been complied with. There is no question but that due notice was given of the special resolution, and that it was passed. I think that the further provision that the company shall be heard, if they require to be heard, has also been complied with. Sufficient notice was given to enable the company in fact to have convened a board meeting if so minded. They did not do so, but the two directors and the general manager of the company who attended were heard at such length as they desired. The matter was one which from the point of view of the corporation, whether rightly or not, was urgent. There was, I think, nothing oppressive in their declining under these circumstances to adjourn the matter. I think the language of article 20 was satisfied. I am therefore of opinion that due notice to determine was given.

Upon the second question the matter therefore stands thus: At the date when the Act was passed the company were in possession of powers which would expire on the 4th of February, 1900. The licence in favour of the corporation was not granted until August, 1902. At that date there existed in the company no powers by agreement with the local authority upon which section 3 could have operation so as to continue them. For this purpose the material date, as regards the existence of the powers, is not the passing of the Act, but the date of the granting of the new licence. Upon this ground, first, I think the plaintiffs fail.

Again, secondly, I have this to say upon the construction of section 3 of the Act of 1899. Section 3 (1) is addressed to the continuation of powers acquired by agreement with the local authority. Section 3 (4) has to do with the extension of the licence granted by the Postmaster-General to the company. The language of the latter is quite free ambiguity. The licence is there to be extended and continue for the period specified in the new licence for the duration of the new licence. This assists me to determine the meaning of the word "thereof" in section 3 (1). That sub-section, I think, is to be so read that the powers shall continue for the period specified in the new licence for the duration of the powers. I think it was intended in this case to leave it to the Postmaster-General to say, in issuing the new licence, what was reasonable as regards the duration of the powers acquired by the old company by agreement with the local authority. The new licence in this case specified nothing as to the duration of the powers. If, therefore, my construction of the section be right, then upon this ground again the plaintiffs have not by the statute obtained any extension of the agreement of March, 1899, but its powers came to an end upon the expiration of the notice given on the 4th of August, 1899.

There is a third way of stating it, which is this: The powers which the company had acquired by agreement were determinable powers. If I assume (contrary to that which I think is the true construction) that the word "thereof" means "of the new licence," then the Act only continues for the period specified in the new licence for the duration of the new licence powers which were determinable and which have been determined.

Upon the above grounds I think that the plaintiffs fail, and I dismiss the action with costs.

Held, that naturalization in time of war is an illegal act, and confers no rights on anyone, and that the prisoner was not protected by the 6th section of the Naturalization Act, 1870.

Held, further, that it was not necessary that the prisoner should be within the realm in order to support an indictment under the Act of Edward III.

Held, also, that in cases of treason it is not usual to quash the indictment, but the prisoner can proceed by way of motion in arrest of judgment.

This was the trial at bar of Arthur Lynch, M.P. for County Galway, for high treason.

The indictment was framed under 25 Ed. 3, Statute 5, c. 2, which provides that the crime of high treason is committed if a man do levy war against our lord the King in his realm, or be adherent to the King's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort in the realm.

The indictment set out the following counts:

First count.—Adhering to, aiding, and comforting the Government of the South African Republic and the burghers and men of the said South African Republic under the said Government, enemies of the late Queen. Overt acts in South African Republic: (1) Declaration (exhibit 6); (2) oath of allegiance (exhibit 7); (3) oath as colonel of Irish corps (exhibit 9); (4) oath as special justice of the peace to Irish corps (exhibit 8); (5) departing from Pretoria with intent to join enemies in Natal; (6) publishing address to Irishmen (exhibit 11); (7) commanding 2nd Irish Brigade in South African Republic; (8) inquiry at Vereeniging; (9) recruiting at Johannesburg; (10) commandeering horses, &c., at Johannesburg; (11) consulting with enemies to levy war against the late Queen in South African Republic.

Second count.—Adhering to, aiding, and comforting the Government of the South African Republic and the burghers and men of the said South African Republic under the said Government, enemies of the late Queen. Overt acts in Natal: (1) Commanding 2nd Irish Brigade in Natal; (2) composing and sending for publication address to Irishmen (exhibit 11); (3) fighting at Sundays River; (4) consulting with enemies to levy war against the late Queen in Natal.

Third count.—Adhering to the Government of the Orange Free State, and the burghers and the men of the said Orange Free State under the said Government, enemies of the late Queen. Overt acts in South African Republic with intent to assist the Government of the South African Republic, and the burghers and men of the South African Republic under the said last-mentioned Government, allies of the said enemies of the late Queen—as in count 1 (mutatis mutandis).

Fourth count.—Adhering to the Government of the Orange Free State and the burghers and men of the Orange Free State under the said Government, enemies of the late Queen. Overt acts in Natal with intent to assist the Government of the South African Republic and the burghers and men of the South African Republic under the said last-mentioned Government, allies of the said enemies of the late Queen—as in count 2 (mutatis mutandis).

The prisoner having been called upon to plead,

Avory, K.C. (Shee, K.C., H. C. Bower, and Dwyer with him), for the prisoner.—I desire, before pleading, to raise the objection that the indictment discloses no offence against the prisoner, as it only alleges an adhering to the enemy without the realm.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (Sir E. Carson, S.G., Guy Stevenson, and Graham Campbell with him), for the Crown.—It is not allowable for the defence to raise this defence at this stage. Any motion of this kind must be made in arrest of judgment. In Comyn's Digest, vol. 4, p. 545, it is laid down that an indictment may be quashed upon motion or a nolle prosequi entered, but that in an enormous crime, as in treason or felony, the court would put the defendant to his demurrer or plea. Every point that can be taken for the prisoner is open to him, but the matter ought not to be raised in this summary manner.

He referred to the following authorities: 2 Hawkins' Pleas, c. 25, s. 146, p. 337 (6th ed.); 1 East's Pleas of the Crown, p. 110; 7 Will. 3 c. 3; Chitty's Criminal Law, vol. 1, p. 300; Rex v. Wheatley, 1 W. Bl. 273; Rex v. Johnson, 1 Wils. 325; Reg. v. Heane, 12 W. R. 417, 4 B. & S. 947; Rex v. Sheares, 27 State Trials, col. 255; and Cranburne's case, 13 State Trials, col. 221.

Avory, K.C.—I submit I am entitled to raise the objection now. The precedents cited by the Attorney-General are relics of a barbarous age. Reg. v. Heane is really in my favour, for the court held there that the notice was made too late and that the court was not ousted of its right to quash an indictment for the want or defect of a plea.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I should be loth to disregard the objection taken by Mr. Avory if it were really directed against a rule which was a relic of barbarism, but in my opinion the rule is still in vigour. The mere fact that for the last hundred years trials for high treason have been less numerous does not in my opinion diminish the force of the authorities which have been cited before us, assuming them to be founded in reason and justice. But I am of opinion the contention of the Crown is founded in good sense. I think, without referring at any length to the authorities, that the statement of law in 1 East's Pleas of the Crown is correct. In my view it must be for the discretion of the court whether they will entertain the objection at the present stage, and, as has been pointed out by the Attorney-General, the prisoner is not deprived of the opportunity of raising the point at a later stage, and of carrying this case to the highest Court of Appeal. I am clearly of opinion we ought not to entertain the matter at the present stage.

The prisoner having then pleaded not guilty, evidence was given on behalf of the Crown, in the course of which it was proved that in January, 1900, the prisoner went to the Transvaal, and that on the 10th of January, 1900, he signed a declaration declaring his willingness to take up arms on behalf of the South African Republic, and on the same date he took the oath of allegiance to the Republic. Letters of naturalization were then issued to him and he became a full burgher of the Republic.

The following are the material sections of the Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 14), which deal with the naturalization of English subjects in foreign countries:

Section 6.—"Any British subject who has at any time before, or may at any time after, the passing of this Act . . . voluntarily become naturalized in any foreign state shall from and after the time of his so having become naturalized in such foreign state be deemed to have ceased to be a British subject, and be regarded as an alien . . ."

Section 15.—"Where any British subject has in pursuance of this Act become an alien he shall not thereby be discharged from any liability in respect of any acts done before the date of his so becoming an alien."

Shee, K.C.—I submit that there is no evidence to go to the jury that the prisoner has been guilty of the crime of high treason. Previous to the Act of 1870, the doctrine of once an Englishman always an Englishman prevailed, but the constant flow of emigration rendered it desirable that the law should be changed. My case rests on the Naturalization Act, 1870, s. 6. The language of that section is so clear that I contend that effect should be given to it: see Abley v. Dale, 11 C. B. 378. There is no mention in the section of the case of war, and therefore a British subject was entitled to become a foreigner in time of war. The object of the Act was to avoid the difficulties which arise from double, and even sometimes treble nationality. Section 4 of the Act of 1870 proves that war was in the minds of those who drafted the Act. Next I say that the main idea of the Act was naturalization in time of war and not in time of peace. Difficulties have arisen between America and ourselves—e.g., in the case of the war in 1812 as to British subjects fighting against this country, and the Act provided for such cases. It was in fact not intended to treat as a traitor a subject who became naturalized abroad. Since the Act of Edward III. was passed, the civilized world has changed, and the conceptions of a subject's allegiance which then prevailed no longer apply now, and the Legislature has therefore dispensed with limitations in other times considered necessary.

He also referred to Cockburn on Nationality.

Avory, K.C.—I desire to support Mr. Shee's argument. Here every count alleges the accused is a British subject, and in order to prevent section 6 from applying the Crown has to read into the section the words "except in time of war," or "except war is in contemplation or when war is imminent." I contend that section 15 of the Act supports my view. That was put into the Act to preserve the liability of a man in respect for an act done before he became an alien.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and Sir E. Carson, S.G., for the Crown.—The 6th section of the Act has no application to an act which would be in itself a crime. Here was a naturalization which could only be obtained, on this subject agreeing to fight against his country. Furthermore, two of the overt acts alleged took place previous to the naturalization. When war breaks out between two countries all peaceful relations are suspended. Contracts between the subjects of two hostile countries are absolutely void: see Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B. 763 at p. 781, and Janson Co. v. Driefontein, ante, p. 142, [1902] A. C. 484. The case was all the stronger when the contract was made with the opposing state itself. Section 6 clearly referred only to a state of peace, not to an act at once void and criminal.

They referred to the following American authorities: Duguet v. Rhinelander, 1 Johns. Cas. 476; Jackson v. New York Insurance Co., 2 Johns. Expatriation.

Shee, K.C., in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We none of us have any doubt on this matter, but having regard to the nature of these proceedings, we thought it better the point should be argued out. The indictment, which is framed upon the Act, alleges altogether some fifteen overt acts, but for the purposes of this argument it is important to draw the distinction between the subsequent overt acts and the first two overt acts that are alleged—viz., a declaration to the terms of which I will refer presently, and an oath of allegiance to the Government of the South African Republic—which are admitted to precede the naturalization which Colonel Lynch is supposed to have obtained. The other acts, which may be shortly summarized as taking part in deliberate acts of warfare against the British forces, need not be discussed in detail because they are all acts of the same character—namely, acts of warfare against the forces of the Crown after the period when it is said Lynch obtained his naturalization.

It is not disputed by counsel that but for the Act of 1870 the case must have gone to the jury. Mr. Shee began his argument by stating that he could not contend that before the Act of 1870 what was charged in the indictment would not be a crime according to the law of England. Nor does he contend that it is not a crime at the present time, except so far as he contends that section 6 of the Act of 1870 prevents a man who has obtained naturalization from being charged any longer with the act being unlawful. Therefore it is not necessary to deal with the arguments of the Crown on the second part of the case—that is to say, the acts committed by Lynch after he obtained naturalization. Therefore I had better read the two sections of the Act in order that my statement of the law may be complete in itself. [Lord ALVERSTONE here read the two sections set out above.] It is contended by counsel that having regard to the motive and object of this legislation, that the Act contemplates a person being naturalized in time of war and contemplates protection from the consequences of illegal acts, which acts were done by the subject before naturalization. Now it cannot be seriously denied that the two first material acts here done were done before naturalization—they are the basis of naturalization, and without them naturalization could not have been obtained at all. The first act is that the prisoner took and signed this declaration: "I, the undersigned Arthur Lynch, up to the present an Irishman born in Australia, hereby declare my willingness to take up arms for this Republic in order to maintain and defend its independence, which now is or in the future may be threatened, and therefore desire to take the oath of allegiance as a full burgher in the South African Republic, signed at Pretoria on the 18th of January, 1900.—Arthur Lynch." Of course, upon the evidence, which would be for the consideration of the jury, hostilities were then raging between the Boer Republic and the British forces, war having been declared in the previous month of October. The other document is the oath of allegiance which is taken to the Transvaal Republic on his wishing to obtain the letters of naturalization.

I am quite clearly of opinion that the language of section 6, without the introduction of any words at all, will in no way justify the argument that a person is excused from the consequence of being naturalized, but only deals with what is to happen to a person after he has become naturalized. If it was a crime at the time of the passing of this Act to become naturalized under the circumstances under which the prisoner did become naturalized, there is nothing whatever in the section to make it otherwise than a criminal act. It follows from that, that the very language of section 15 leaves such a person liable to the consequences of the act which he has committed, and in respect of which he ex hypothesi is charged.

I now wish in a very few sentences to indicate why I am also clearly of opinion that the subsequent acts must be left to the jury, and that the subsequent acts following on this act are not protected by section 6 of the Act of 1870. Those acts cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as being otherwise than acts of overt treason notwithstanding what passed on the 18th of January. I wish not merely to adopt the language, which I think is well founded and well expressed in some of those judgments which have been read to us on behalf of the Crown, but I also wish to say that there is, in my opinion, nothing in the Act of 1870 that can justify the contention that an act of treason can give rights to any person whatever; if such a monstrous consequence is to be allowed by the law of England it must be found in clear and explicit language, and not by a construction put upon a section framed with another intent and designed to serve another purpose. Further, in my opinion, for the reasons given in the judgments cited, both of our own courts and those of the United States, whatever a declaration of war may or may not do, it prevents British subjects from making arrangements with the King's enemies, at least when such arrangements constitute crimes against the law of the country to which they relate. Many more reasons might be given for the decision at which we have arrived, but I have felt it right to express, in the plainest language I could use, the main grounds on which I have come to the conclusion that the Act of 1870 affords no defence, and has for the purposes of this trial no bearing upon any one of the overt acts alleged.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is impossible to contend that the two acts which preceded the letters of naturalization were not such acts as are fit to be submitted to the jury; there is certainly nothing in the Act of 1870 which would cover those actions supposing the letters of naturalization to be valid. With regard to the rest of the case, it is in my opinion sufficient to say that I have never been able to comprehend how it could possibly be contended that an act of treason could give rights of any sort, civil rights or rights in the nature of an exemption from criminal responsibility to the person who has been guilty of them. Those preliminary acts having been done in furtherance of the process of getting letters of naturalization, being themselves criminal and treasonable, are at all events evidence of treason. It appears to me impossible that any such exemption as is contended for can be claimed in virtue of the subsequent grant of letters of naturalization; and I think it is worth while to point out that if the argument were sound a regiment or division of the army might desert in the hour of battle and yet no man be subject to the penalties of treason, by each person individually accepting letters of naturalization. It seems to me so extravagant a conclusion that it forms an additional reason for saying that the argument on which it is founded cannot be sound.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me a very simple case. The only real question before us is the construction of the 6th section of the Naturalization Act, and admitting the truth of the proposition that it is right for the court to look at the words of the Act and to attribute to them their ordinary meaning, it seems to me there is not one word in the section which can bear the interpretation which is sought to be put upon it. The section is not dealing with the circumstances under which naturalization may be legal or illegal, it is dealing with the consequences of naturalization. As a matter of fact it assumes throughout that naturalization did exist, and was not in itself unlawful. And then it says that where naturalization in a foreign state has or may have taken place it shall have certain consequences. It is agreed that before then naturalization with a foreign state with which we were at peace was lawful, but with an enemy it was obviously illegal and an act of treason.

The result is, therefore, so far as the first act is concerned, it was an act of treason, and would have been if committed before 1870, and there is not a syllable in the Act to make it otherwise now. That being so, it settles all questions without reference to section 15 of the Act. I think the argument that this was one act, a declaration made for the purpose of naturalization followed by naturalization the same day, is correct, and therefore section 15 of the Act does not help us very much; but the overt act was a treason, and there is nothing in the Act to make it otherwise.

The other acts no doubt stand on a different footing, but I adopt everything the Lord Chief Justice has said on that part of the case, and do not desire to add anything.

Avory, K.C.—I now desire to submit what I proposed to submit at an earlier stage, that there is no evidence to go to the jury of any treason under the statute of Edward III.—namely, "adhering to the King's enemies in his realm or elsewhere." The words may mean either that the accused person being in the realm has been adherent to the King's enemies wherever they are, or that the enemies being in the realm the accused has been adherent to them wherever he is. The cases show the first is the true interpretation. Every indictment under this Act has alleged the accused was within the realm or else a count of compassing the King's death has been added. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., referred to Rex v. Vaughan, 13 State Trials, col. 486.] That case was not under this Act. The enemy was clearly outside the realm, and this Act has no application here.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G.—This Act has been in operation 556 years, and this is the first time this construction has been suggested. If Mr. Avory's contention is right, a man might carry on war abroad against this country and yet not be guilty of treason.

He referred to Mulcahay's case, L. R. 3 H. L. 306, 17 W. R. H. L Dig. 4, 9; 18 Geo. 3, c. 30, ss. 1 and 2; Coke upon Lyttelton, 3rd Inst., 3, 10, 11, and 261 (B).

The Court then intimated they were satisfied with authorities cited by the Attorney-General, and overruled the point. Counsel on either side then addressed the jury, and the Lord Chief Justice having summed up, the jury found the prisoner guilty, and he was sentenced to death by Wills, J.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Stud-book, and the owner of this mare brought an action in the French courts against the present plaintiff, alleging that the true mare Pentecost, of which he was the owner, had been previously imported into France. The owner of the mare recovered judgment against the present plaintiff, who was condemned to pay damages.

In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for an indemnity in respect of the damages he had suffered:

Held, that there was evidence that the mare sent by the defendants to the plaintiff was the true mare Pentecost, and that, consequently, the plaintiff had no right of action against the defendants, as the damages recovered in the French courts against the plaintiff were not in consequence of any act done by him in pursuance of his employment by the defendants, but in consequence of the mistake made in the French courts as to the identity of the mare.

Action tried by Bruce, J., without a jury.

This was an action by an auctioneer for an indemnity in respect of damages which he alleged he had suffered when acting as agent of the defendants for the sale of a mare named Pentecost. There was also a claim for misrepresentation.

The plaintiff, M Chéri Raymond Halbronn, was an auctioneer carrying on business in Paris.

In October, 1898, the defendants instructed him to put up to auction in Paris a bay mare which they represented to be a thoroughbred mare named Pentecost, foaled in England in 1888 by Peter out of Lady Kars, by Mogador out of Belle of Kars, by Knight of Kars, and as having been then for the first time imported into France.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants undertook to furnish the pedigree of the horse and the necessary certificate issued by Messrs. Weatherby, the keepers of the English Stud-book, verifying the identity of the mare.

The plaintiff advertised the mare in his catalogue and in various French sporting newspapers, and she was sent to him to be sold.

A M. Raoul Richer Delaveau then brought an action in the French courts against the present plaintiff, alleging that the true mare Pentecost had been imported into France in 1893, and that he (M. Delaveau) was the owner. M. Delaveau recovered judgment against the plaintiff, who was condemned to pay 2,000f. by way of damages.

The plaintiff by his pleadings alleged that the mare was consigned to him for sale, that she was not of the pedigree and identity represented, and he claimed as damages the amount of the French judgment together with the costs.

The defendants alleged that the mare they sent over to the plaintiff was in fact the true mare Pentecost. It appeared that there was a Pentecost in the French Stud-book, but the defendants said that the mare there entered was not the true Pentecost.

From the evidence given on behalf of the defendants it appeared that the mare sent by the defendants to the plaintiff was born in Ireland, and taken to a stud farm at Enfield.

In June, 1893, she was sold from the farm to a Mr. Aitken for export abroad.

It was stated that when horses in the stud-book are exported it is necessary to get a certificate for them.

Pentecost was in the stud-book, and a receipt was obtained from Messrs. Weatherby entitling the purchaser to a certificate.

She remained at the farm until March, 1895, when she was sent to Tattersall's for sale with other horses and was bought by a Mr. S. Woodland for nine guineas.

Evidence establishing the identity of the mare was also given.

In his evidence M. Halbronn, the plaintiff, stated that he asked the defendants for a proper certificate from Messrs. Weatherby and that the defendants undertook to send it. He thereupon advertised the mare, but the certificate was not sent. M. Dalaveau then brought an action, and recovered judgment against him. When he, the plaintiff, found that there were difficulties, he did not put the mare up to auction. He himself discovered that the mare was in both English and French stud-books. He wrote to Messrs. Weatherby for a certificate for the purchaser, and they refused to give it until the mystery was cleared up.

Upon the above evidence Bruce, J., held as a fact that Pentecost was not taken away in 1893 and that the mare sent by the defendants to the plaintiff was the true mare Pentecost.

Roland Vaughan Williams, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff has a good cause of action against the defendants on an implied indemnity for all acts done by him within the scope of his authority as auctioneer on their behalf: Spurrier v. Elderton, 5 Esp. 1. Further, the plaintiff had an express undertaking in writing by the defendants that they would obtain for him a certificate of the mare from Messrs. Weatherby, and acting on the faith of that undertaking the plaintiff had advertised the mare for sale. The defendants failed to obtain the certificate and in consequence the plaintiff had suffered a loss. This loss the defendants should now be liable for: Frixione v. Tagliaferro, 4 W. R. 373, 10 Moo. P. C. 175; and Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 66.

G. A. Scott, for the defendants.—The plaintiff has no right of action against the defendants. The damages recovered in the French court against the plaintiff were not in consequence of any act done by the plaintiff in pursuance of his employment by the defendants, but in consequence of the mistake made as to the identity of the mare. The defendants are in nowise answerable for that mistake and cannot be rendered liable to pay the damages awarded by the French court against the plaintiff. An auctioneer only has a right of indemnity from his principal where the principal has made a mis-statement: see Adamson v. Jarvis. There was no binding undertaking entered into by the defendants to furnish the certificate upon which the plaintiff can render them liable in law. The object of obtaining the certificate was not for the purpose of the advertisement of the sale, but in order that it might be given to the purchaser of the mare.

Dec. 18.—BRUCE, J., read the following judgment: It was contended by Mr. Vaughan Williams that the mere fact of the employment of plaintiff as auctioneer by the defendants involved an obligation on the part of the defendants to indemnify the plaintiff against all claims arising out of the plaintiff's conduct as auctioneer in respect of acts done by him within the scope of his authority. I am not prepared to assent to that proposition, although the phrase "claim arising out of the plaintiff's conduct as auctioneer" is a very wide one and the extent of the proposition depends greatly upon the meaning given to that phrase. If one employs an auctioneer to sell a picture by Constable, which is in truth a genuine Constable, and the auctioneer sells it as a Constable, and afterwards the purchaser of the picture brings an action against the auctioneer for falsely selling the picture as a Constable and succeeds in persuading a jury that the picture is not a Constable and so recovers damages against the auctioneer, the damages so recovered are damages arising not from the conduct of the auctioneer, but are damages arising from a mistaken view of the facts taken by the jury; and if, as I have assumed, the picture were a genuine Constable, the claim for damages would not arise from the mere fact of the sale of the picture by the auctioneer, and the auctioneer would have no claim to recover against the person who had entrusted him with the sale of the picture the damages awarded against him by the verdict of the jury.

So in the present case the damages recovered in the French court against the plaintiff in this action arose, not from any act done by the plaintiff in pursuance of his employment by the defendants, but arose from the mistake as to the identity of the mare Pentecost arising from the fact that some person in France had procured another mare to be entered in the Paris stud-book as Pentecost. In my opinion, the defendants are in no wise answerable for this mistake, and they cannot be rendered liable to pay to the present plaintiff the damages which the French court awarded against him. Mr. Vaughan Williams further contended that there was an agreement by which the defendants promised to furnish a certificate of export issued by Messrs. Weatherby verifying the identity of the mare, and that it was in compliance with such promise, and in reliance on the same, that the plaintiff advertised the mare. But I do not think there is sufficient evidence of any such promise or undertaking.

The plaintiff was employed to sell Pentecost as a thoroughbred mare foaled in England in 1888 by Sir Peter out of Lady Kars, and as having been in October, 1898, for the first time imported into France. And, as I have said, the mare answered that description. It is true that the plaintiff wrote to the defendants on the 26th of October, 1898, asking them to be good enough to send him a certificate from Messrs. Weatherby for the mare, and the defendants answered on the 31st of October, "We will, of course, get you this certificate in good time." The defendants were willing to oblige the plaintiff by endeavouring to get for him a certificate from Messrs. Weatherby, but there was no contract or undertaking by the defendants to procure such a certificate. The plaintiff was aware that there was a double entry of the same mare in the English and in the French stud-book, and that some mistake had occurred respecting one or other of the entries, and he must have known that a certificate of export for Pentecost could not then be granted by Messrs. Weatherby until the confusion arising out of the double entry had been cleared up.

The defendants on the 31st of October, when they said they would get the certificate the plaintiff asked for, were not aware of the double entry and did not know that any difficulty had arisen.

I do not think there was any binding undertaking to furnish the certificate entered into by the defendants upon which the plaintiff can render them liable in law. I think that the undertaking which the defendants entered into with the plaintiff only extended to this, that the mare was the genuine Pentecost foaled in England in 1888 and for the first time imported into France in 1898. That undertaking was never broken, and in my opinion no ground exists for rendering the defendants liable in the present action.

If the defendants had sent the mare to the plaintiff to be sold upon a false description, then the present case would have resembled the case of Adamson v. Jarvis, upon which Mr. Williams relied. But the facts in that case do not, I think, bear any resemblance to the present. So I think the case of Frixione v. Tagliaferro, which was much relied upon by Mr. Williams, has little or no bearing on the present case. That was the case of an action brought by an agent against his principal to recover the amount of damages sustained by him in a suit which he defended on their behalf. In that case the agent was authorized by his principals to sell wheat to arrive in June. His principals neglected to provide wheat for a June delivery and consequently an action was brought against the agent for breach of contract, and judgment was given in the Tribunal of Commerce of Genoa against him. The agent sued, in the court at Malta, his principals to recover from them the amount in which he had been condemned in the court at Genoa. The court at Malta decided that the principals were not liable to reimburse the agent, but, on appeal to the Privy Council the decision of the court of Malta was reversed and the principals were held liable. In the judgment in that case there is dictum a of the Right Hon. Pemberton Leigh upon which Mr. Williams placed great reliance. It is as follows: 'It is said that the sentence of the court at Genoa was erroneous in law, but this is immaterial. . . . Be that sentence right or wrong, the appellant thereby sustained a heavy loss on behalf of the respondents, and they must bear the consequences." But this dictum must be read in connection with the facts proved in that case. It appeared there that the agent (the appellant) communicated at every step in the action brought against him at Genoa with the respondents, and acted with their approval, that he treated the action as their action, and that he defended it for them, and that the respondents approved of his conduct on their behalf. And upon this ground I can well understand why it mattered not whether the judgment of the court at Genoa was right or wrong, because the principals in that case had authorized their agent to defend the proceedings in that court, and so had rendered themselves liable for the consequences resulting from the judgment of the court. In the present case the plaintiff has failed, in my opinion, in making out a good cause of action against the defendants, and I must give judgment for the defendants with costs.

Practice—Evidence—Perpetuation of testimony—Right of action—Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 93), ss. 1, 8—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 37, rr. 35, 36.

In an action to perpetuate testimony the plaintiff is not entitled as of right to an order for the examination of witnesses, although the action is properly brought within the terms of ord. 37, r. 35. The court has a discretion as to whether it will make the order or not, and the fact that the matter in controversy can be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation is a fact which the court will take into consideration in exercising that discretion.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by E. H. J. B. Sackville West against Lord Sackville and other members of the Sackville-West family and the Attorney-General for the purpose of perpetuating testimony with regard to the following facts: That the plaintiff was the lawful and eldest son of the defendant Lord Sackville, and was entitled for an estate in tail male expectant on the decease of the said Lord Sackville to the family estates, and to the dignity, title, and honour of Baron Sackville of Knole.

By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the defendant Lord Sackville was, in 1864 or 1866, duly married to one Joséphine Durande Ortéga, either in Spain or in France, and that he (the plaintiff) was the eldest child of the marriage, having been born at Arcachon on the 24th of July, 1869; that the defendants, other than the Attorney-General, falsely asserted that Lord Sackville was never married, and that the lady in question was at the time of her alleged marriage to Lord Sackville the lawful wife of one De La Oliva; that he (the plaintiff) had discovered that the lady was acknowledged by Lord Sackville to be his lawful wife, and the plaintiff to be the lawful issue of the marriage, but that he was unable to bring to trial his rights and claims so long as Lord Sackville was entitled in possession to the said properties and dignity; and that several of the necessary witnesses were old and infirm.

It appeared that in 1897, and therefore at a time previous to the present action, the present defendants, other than the Attorney-General, had themselves commenced an action against the present plaintiff and the Attorney-General to perpetuate testimony with reference to the fact that the plaintiff was not the legitimate son of Lord Sackville—the same fact as now in issue; that in that action several Spanish witnesses were examined at Gibraltar; that the plaintiff had sent a representative to Gibraltar to attend the examination of these witnesses, and who might, if he had chosen, have cross-examined the witnesses. It appeared also, as will be seen from the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., that since the time of the examination of those witnesses an erasure had been discovered in a certain ecclesiastical document material to the case.

Kekewich, J., granted the plaintiff leave to issue letters of request for the examination of certain witnesses resident in Spain, and liberty to sue out a commission for the examination of certain witnesses resident in France, being of opinion that the plaintiff came within rule 35 of order 37, because neither the claim to the peerage nor the claim to the estates could be brought to trial until the happening of Lord Sackville's death.

The defendants, other than the Attorney-General, appealed.

Rules 35, 36, and 37 of order 37 are as follows:

Rule 35: "Any person who would under the circumstances alleged by him to exist become entitled, upon the happening of any future event, to any title, dignity, or office, or to any estate or interest in any property, real or personal, the right or claim to which cannot by him be brought to trial before the happening of such event, may commence an action to perpetuate any testimony which may be material for establishing such right or claim."

Rule 36: "In all actions to perpetuate testimony touching any honour, title, dignity, or office, or any other matter or thing in which the Crown may have any estate or interest, the Attorney-General may be made a defendant, and in all proceedings in which the depositions taken in any such action, in which the Attorney-General was so made a defendant, may be offered in evidence, such depositions shall be admissible notwithstanding any objection to such depositions upon the ground that the Crown was not a party to the action in which such depositions were taken."

Rule 37: "Witnesses shall not be examined to perpetuate testimony unless an action has been commenced for the purpose."

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Ralph Bankes, for the appellants.—No order ought to have been made—firstly, because the pliantiff's claim can be immediately brought to trial under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858; secondly, because witnesses have already been examined. The question should at any rate be determined during the lifetime of the principal witness, Lord Sackville.

They referred to Angell v. Angell, 1 Sim. & St. 83; Watkins v. Atchinson, 10 Hare, App. xlvi.

Warrington, K.C., and Waggett, for the respondent.—Great harm to the respondent might result if this order is discharged. He might be unable to prove now what he could prove hereafter in the light of fresh evidence. He is not bound to prove his claim at once so as to suit the pleasure of the appellants.

They referred to Frederick v. Attorney-General, L. R. 3 P. & M. 270, 23 W. R. Dig. 85.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., for the Crown.—This is a matter for the discretion of the court, who should, however, remember that Lord Sackville is the most important witness, and that in the interests of justice the question should be determined during his lifetime.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not think that the order which was made in this action by Kekewich, J., for the examination of these witnesses for the perpetuation of testimony ought to have been made. I do not agree with the suggestion, if such suggestion was really intended to be made, that anyone is entitled as a matter of right to an order of this sort in an action to perpetuate testimony. I think that, even if the circumstances are such that the action to perpetuate testimony clearly will lie, there must always be a discretion in the court as to whether they will make the order or not.

I agree with Kekewich, J., that the plaintiff's case has not been brought before the court in such a way as to induce the court to exercise a discretion in his favour, but I do not think one can decide the case upon that ground.

(a.) Reported by R. R. CAMPBELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was suggested by Mr. Bankes that, because under the old practice a suit for perpetuation of testimony could only be effectively brought where the matter in controversy could not be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation by the party who sought to perpetuate the testimony, it necessarily followed that, inasmuch as the plaintiff here could, if he chose, bring an action under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, this order ought not to have been made. I cannot agree there. I quite agree that when one comes to exercise discretion in the matter it is a very proper thing to take into consideration, but I should hesitate to lay down as an absolute rule that an action to perpetuate testimony can never be brought if the matter in controversy can at once be determined otherwise. For instance, in the present case we find as a fact that the defendants have actually commenced such an action themselves and they have had an examination of witnesses for the purpose of perpetuation of testimony which has been executed at Gibraltar under English action before the court there in the presence of the acting Attorney-General. In this case it is obvious on facts which are common to both sides that since that examination took place a matter has come to be public knowledge which was unknown to both sides at the time of the examination —I mean the fact of the erasure in the ecclesiastical register, a matter which obviously might be of very great importance in reference to the value of the evidence taken in Gibraltar. I should hesitate myself to say that there was any hard and fast rule which would prevent an order either for the further examination or cross-examination of the witnesses under the order obtained by the defendants, or even for the examination of other witnesses who might throw a light on the question of when and at what time this erasure was detected.

It is convenient to see how the matter stands under the order, and just to refer shortly to the old practice. The order is order 37, and the particular rule is rule 35. We have had a discussion to-day as to the effect of the words "the right or claim to which cannot by him be brought to trial before the happening of such event." It is said here that what really is being claimed by the plaintiff is either the title to the peerage or the estate or interest in remainder in tail in this property expectant upon the death of Lord Sackville, and it is said that no action can now be brought to establish either the title to the peerage or the right or claim to the property. I am not sure that it is necessary to decide exactly what these words mean, but, whatever they mean, it seems to me that if the court is of opinion that in substance the plaintiff, by virture of the provisions of the Legitimacy Declaration Act, can try that which plainly on the admission of both sides is the only question really at issue between the parties—that is to say, the legitimacy of the plaintiff—the court ought, in the exercise of its discretion, to refuse the present order. I may as well refer to the sections in Story's Equity Jurisprudence which deal with the matter. First there is section 1505, which says: "The object of all bills of this sort is to preserve or perpetuate testimony when it is in danger of being lost before the matter to which it relates can be made the subject of judicial investigation." Then it is said, in section 1508: "If, therefore, it be possible that the matter in controversy can be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation by the party who seeks to perpetuate testimony the court of equity will not entertain any bill. The party under such circumstances has it fully in his power to terminate the controversy by commencing a proper action, and therefore there is no reasonable ground to give him the advantage of deferring his proceedings to a future time and substituting thereby written depositions for vivâ voce evidence." It seems to me that that rule of practice, which was established of old in the courts of equity, ought to govern the discretion of the court under ord. 37, r. 35.

Primâ facie, therefore, it seems to me that an order ought not to be made in this case. But, as I have already said, I think that the two facts, the fact that the defendants have themselves already taken proceedings to perpetuate testimony, and have not only done so, but have examined their witnesses, and the fact that matters have occurred since the examination of the witnesses which clearly must throw a great deal of light on the matter, might be a very good reason for departing from the rule which would ordinarily regulate the discretion of the court in such a matter. I was very anxious, if I could, to prevent any injustice being done to the plaintiff, and having that feeling I sought to see whether we might not do something to assist him. But he takes up the position, which he has a perfect right to take up, of saying that he will not undertake either immediately or within a limited time to bring any action at all to establish any claim. The inference that I draw from that is that the plaintiff does not feel much pressed by the disadvantages which I thought might result to his case if the further examination of these witnesses were not allowed to take place, and that, at all events, if he does feel at all pressed by that, he feels more pressed by the advantage which will accrue to him by postponing the trial of this action, possibly even to the time of Lord Sackville's death. Under the circumstances I think it is desirable in the present case to deal with this case as a case where the plaintiff might really have the question of his legitimacy determined at once if he chose—a question which goes to the root of his claim. Treating the case as such, I do not think that any order ought to be made to assist the plaintiff in such a position.

I have no reason to doubt here but that the defendants have been well advised in this matter as to what is the proper course for them to take up, and I would not take upon myself to criticize their conduct. But, speaking generally, I believe that in every case it is to the interest of the party who believes his cause to be just and right to get all the light thrown upon it that can be thrown upon it, and to leave nothing obscure or in doubt.

ROMER, L.J.—I think that the court was not bound under the circumstances of this case to make an order at plaintiff's instance for the examination of the witnesses referred to in the evidence filed on his behalf. I cannot say that the action was one that on the face of it could not be brought under ord. 37, r. 35, but it must be borne in mind that that rule and the subsequent rules are rules of procedure and are not intended to form a code of law. Rule 35 does not, in my opinion, oblige the court to make an order in favour of the plaintiff in every action which may fall within the terms of that rule. I think that I am therefore entitled to look at the circumstances of the case to see whether an order ought or ought not to be made in favour of the plaintiff in this action. I notice that the only testimony asked for by the plaintiff is to prove that there was a valid marriage between his mother and Lord Sackville. I include in that question of fact two distinct issues, one whether there was a ceremony of marriage between his mother and Lord Sackville in fact, and secondly, even if there was what otherwise would have been a valid marriage, whether the lady was or was not at the time a married woman. The validity of that marriage, then, is the sole question of fact as to which the plaintiff requires testimony. Now I take it to be clear that the court does not in actions of this kind accede to the demand of the plaintiff to perpetuate testimony when he can bring the fact which he wishes to establish by his evidence to the immediate determination of a competent tribunal. There are very good reasons why the court should not accede to the demand of the plaintiff in such circumstances. The only question in dispute between the parties can, under the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1858, be effectually and properly determined at once by the Divorce Court on the plaintiff applying under that Act. I think on this short ground the appeal ought to be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action which is brought to perpetuate testimony with reference to the following facts as stated in the statement of claim of the plaintiff—that the defendant is not, as the lawful son of Lord Sackville, entitled to an estate in tail male in certain lands and properties there referred to, or to an estate in the dignity or the title or honour of Baron Sackville of Knole created and granted by letters patent. Now actions and suits, as they formerly were called, for the perpetuation of testimony arose in courts of equity, and the object of them, as stated by Sir John Leach in the case of Angell v. Angell, which has been referred to, was to prevent a failure of justice. The learned judge there said that "the courts of equity do not entertain bills to perpetuate testimony generally for the purpose of being used upon a future occasion except where it is absolutely necessary to prevent a failure of justice," and he goes on to say that "if it be possible that the matter in question can by the party who filed the bill be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation, no such suit is entertained." In old times, bills to perpetuate testimony would only be entertained by the court where it was absolutely necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Now the procedure with reference to this class of action is governed by the rule which has been referred to—namely, ord. 37, r. 35. It seems to me that, although it may be that the plaintiff brings himself within the terms of that rule, yet, in considering any relief that is to be given to the plaintiff, we are entitled to look at the foundation of the old jurisdiction and the mode in which in former days it has been exercised. There are two matters to which attention must be given, it seems to me, with reference to a case of this kind. The main fact, the fact upon which everything else turns, as to which testimony is to be perpetuated, is the legitimacy of the plaintiff. By the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1858 means have been provided by which all the facts as to which testimony is sought to be perpetuated can be investigated by a properly-constituted tribunal. According to the statement of the law as laid down by Lord Redesdale in his treatise on Pleading the bill ought to show that the facts as to which the testimony of the witnesses proposed to be examined are conceived to relate cannot be immediately investigated in a court of law. Here it seems to me that the facts as to which the testimony of the witnesses who are proposed to be examined on behalf of the plaintiff relate can, under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, be immediately investigated by the proper court. I should like also to point out another matter that ought to be taken into consideration. A great change was introduced into the law by the rules of 1883. Lord Lindley, then Master of the Rolls, thus speaks in Ellis v. The Duke of Bedford, 47 W. R. 170, 385, [1899] 1 Ch. 494, "Moreover now, under the Judicature Act actions can be brought merely to declare rights, and this is an innovation of a very important kind. I am referring to ord. 25, r. 5, which says: 'No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby, and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.'" Without finally deciding the question, if in the present case the defendants were willing to have the whole case tried in an action simply seeking a declaration of title, as I rather inferred from what fell from the learned counsel in the course of the argument, it would be a matter which to my mind would influence my judgment very much in considering whether the relief which is sought by the present action ought to be given or no.

On these grounds, first, that there is a means provided by the Legislature which can be availed of to investigate the facts as to which testimony is sought to be perpetuated, and secondly, that at all events with the consent of the defendant the matter might be investigated in another way, I think that the present order ought not to have been made, and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Smiles, 16 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 624, not followed.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers.

On the hearing of a case stated by commissioners of income tax for the opinion of the High Court, under section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, in an appeal to which the Corporation of Manchester were appellants and the surveyor of taxes was respondent, judgment was given for the corporation with costs.

The corporation's bill of costs included a sum for the costs incurred in the settling by their solicitor and counsel of the case which was ultimately stated by the commissioners.

On taxation the taxing-master allowed these costs, and Phillimore, J., refused an application by the surveyor of taxes for a review of taxation.

The surveyor of taxes appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and Rowlatt, for the surveyor of taxes.—There is no power to allow these costs on taxation as between the Crown and the subject. Section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, provides as follows: "(1) Immediately upon the determination of any appeal under the Income Tax Acts by the general commissioners or by the special commissioners . . . the appellant or the surveyor may, if dissatisfied with the determination as being erroneous in point of law, declare his dissatisfaction to the commissioners who heard the appeal, and having done so may, within twenty-one days after the determination, require the commissioners, by notice in writing addressed to their clerk, to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court thereon. The case shall set forth the facts and the determination, and the party requiring the same shall transmit the case, when so stated and signed, to the High Court. . . . (2) (a) The party requiring the case shall, before he shall be entitled to have the case stated, pay to the clerk to the commissioners a fee of twenty shillings for and in respect of the case." Costs incurred either by the Crown or by the subject in preparing or settling such a case cannot be allowed on taxation between them, for they were incurred before the case was on the file, and before any proceedings had been instituted in the High Court. This view has been taken by the Court of Session in Scotland. In the case of Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Smiles, 16 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 624, it was held that the expenses of preparation and adjustment of a case stated under section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, incurred before the case is sent to the roll, are not proper charges against the unsuccessful party in the case. The other side will rely on ord. 65, r. 27, regulation 29, which is one of the rules made in January, 1902, and which provides as follows: "On every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party." That rule, however, ought not to be construed as meaning that the taxing-master may allow costs which are not by law the subject-matter of taxation at all. They will also rely on Glover v. Booth, 31 L. J. M. C. 270, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 75. But that is a decision on another statute, and the Scotch decision on this statute is to be preferred.

They also cited Mc Iver & Co. (Limited) v. Tate Steamers (Limited), 50 W. R. 642, [1902] 2 K. B. 184.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and Bremner, for the corporation.—The preparing and settling the case is a part of the procedure of appealing to the High Court; it is a reasonable and a necessary part. There is no ground for differentiating, so far as taxation of costs is concerned, between this part of the procedure and any other part. The costs of preparing and settling the case ought to be treated as part of the costs which are subject to taxation inter partes. It was expressly held in Glover v. Booth that the costs of preparing and settling a case to be stated by magistrates under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 are allowable on taxation between party and party. It is desirable that there should be uniformity of practice as to the costs of cases stated by magistrates and the costs of cases stated by commissioners of income tax. Even if the Scotch case were good law at the time when it was decided, the law in this country has since been altered by the rules of January, 1902, which by their comprehensive terms give power to the taxing-master to allow these costs.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be dismissed. The question is as to the allowance on taxation as between party and party of the costs of preparing and settling cases stated by commissioners of income tax, incurred before the cases come into the High Court. By modern practice, when such a case is to be stated, the parties are allowed and even invited to see that it is prepared and settled in proper form, and for that purpose either to submit drafts or to make suggestions as to amendments before it is finally stated. That seems to be a desirable practice, as those cases are often complicated, and large sums of money are involved in them. Moreover, a great saving of expense is thereby effected; for if a case is not properly stated and on that account the court cannot satisfactorily decide the issue between the parties, the court has to send the case back again to be re-stated. If the costs incurred by the parties in helping to prepare and settle the case, although incurred before the case is ripe for hearing, are, as I think they are, proper and necessary costs, it seems to be contrary to common sense and natural justice that the successful party should not be entitled to recover them from the other party. That being the primâ facie view of the case, is there any statutory provision which is contrary to that view? It is argued that section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, does disable parties from recovering from one another costs antecedent to the stating of the case. If that section threw absolutely on the commissioners the duty to state a case, it might be that the costs of preparing and settling the case ought not to be thrown on either party. That is the view which was taken in the Scotch case which has been cited. But if the decision in that case rests on the view that the statute prohibits the allowance of these costs as between party and party, there is authority to show that that is not the view which would be taken in this country. It was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in Glover v. Booth that the antecedent expenses of preparing and settling a case to be stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 might be recovered on taxation. The ground of the decision is that that statute, the provisions of which are similar to those with which we are now dealing, does not prohibit the allowance inter partes of such expenses. I am of opinion that that is a correct decision, and that it governs this case. Further, since 1902 we have had the new rule—viz., ord. 65, r. 27, regulation 29—which makes the taxation of costs uniform, and provides for the allowance of all costs which appear to be necessary or proper. I therefore think that the master's order ought to be affirmed, and that the learned judge was right in refusing a review of taxation.

STIRLING, L.J.—I should feel some difficulty in this case but for the change which was made in the rules in 1902. An order has been made on an Inland Revenue officer, who was respondent to an income tax appeal, to pay the appellants their costs of the appeal to the High Court. The question is whether under that order he ought to pay their costs of settling the case which was stated by the commissioners. Section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, says that if either party is dissatisfied with the determination of the commissioners, he may require the commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court. The case may be stated by the commissioners without referring to the parties; but in complicated cases it is necessary for the commissioners to place the case before the parties and their advisers before they finally state it. Here the case was laid before the appellants and certain alterations were made at their instance. The Judicature Act provides for the making of rules, and order 65 of the rules made under the Act deals with costs. By a new rule added to that order in 1902—viz., rule 27, regulation 29, it is provided that "On every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice." Ord. 68, r. 2, provides that order 65 shall apply to all proceedings on the Revenue side of the King's Bench Division. Here the taxing-master held that the costs incurred by the appellants in amending the case were necessary or proper for the attainment of justice, and he allowed those costs on taxation as against the Crown. I think that the order of the master ought to be supported, and it is to be observed that this decision is applicable in favour of the Crown as well as in favour of the subject.

REX v. JUSTICES OF LONDON.
Ex parte REED. (a.)

Licensing Law—Renewal—Transfer—Change of occupancy—Application by new occupier—Removal after expiration of licence—"Person so licensed"—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 14.

At a general annual licensing meeting H., who was the tenant of a beerhouse and holder of a licence to sell by retail beer to be consumed on the premises, applied for a renewal licence. The application having been refused, H. gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions. H. remained in possession of the house till the appeal could be heard, and in the meantime the licence expired. The appeal was dismissed, and then H. removed from the house. A few days later R. became tenant and went into possession.

Held, that, as H. was not a licensed person at the time when he removed from the house, R. was not entitled to apply for a licence under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Channell, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus to the justices of London sitting in quarter sessions to hear and determine a licensing appeal.

On the 7th of May, 1902, James Reed, who had recently become the tenant and occupier of a beerhouse called the Manchester Arms, at Walworth, applied to the justices of London sitting at Newington, at a special session for the transfer of licences, under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, for a licence to sell excisable liquors by retail to be consumed on the premises.

The house was first licensed for the sale of beer by retail to be consumed on the premises before the year 1869, and a renewal licence was granted every year continuously up to and including the year 1901.

In November, 1901, one Hacker became the tenant and occupier of the house, and the then existing licence was transferred to him.

On the 7th of January, 1902, Hacker was convicted of permitting drunkenness on the premises, and was fined 40*s.*, but the conviction was not endorsed on the licence. No conviction had ever been recorded against any of the previous tenants of the house for any offence under the Licensing Acts.

On the 19th of March, 1902, at the general annual licensing meeting, Hacker applied for a renewal licence. The justices refused to grant the application on the ground of the conviction. Hacker thereupon gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions.

On the 5th of April, 1902, the licence expired. Hacker, however, remained in possession of the premises until the appeal could be heard.

On the 18th of April the quarter sessions dismissed the appeal.

On the 21st of April Hacker left the premises, and on the 28th of April Reed became tenant and went into occupation.

Section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, under which Reed applied at the transfer sessions on the 7th of May, enacts (inter alia) as follows: "If any person duly licensed under this Act shall (before the expiration of such licence) die, or shall be by sickness or other infirmity rendered incapable of keeping an inn, or shall become bankrupt; or if any person so licensed, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of any person so licensed, shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence; or if the occupier of any such house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted or shall have neglected to apply at the general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, for a licence to continue to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house . . . it shall be lawful for the justices assembled as aforesaid at a special session holden under the authority of this Act for the division or place in which the house so kept or having been kept shall be situate, in any one of the above-mentioned cases, and in such cases only, to grant to the heirs, executors, or administrators of the person so dying, or to the assigns of such person becoming incapable of keeping an inn, or to the assignee or assignees of such bankrupt, or to any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied . . . a licence to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house or the premises thereunto belonging."

The licensing justices refused to grant a licence to Reed on the ground that the case did not come within section 14. They held, on the authority of Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham, 20 W. R. 702, L. R. 7 Q. B. 482, that Hacker did not come within the words "If any person so licensed . . . shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house," inasmuch as he was not "so licensed" when he removed from the house, his licence having at that time expired; and that, therefore, Reed was not in a position to apply under the section as being "any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied."

Reed appealed from the refusal of the licensing justices to the quarter sessions. The quarter sessions affirmed the decision of the licensing justices on the ground that Reed had not brought himself within section 14, and the appeal was not heard on its merits.

An application was then made on behalf of Reed for a rule nisi for a mandamus to the quarter sessions to hear and determine the appeal. A rule was obtained, but was discharged by the Divisional Court.

Reed appealed.

Avory, K.C. (George Elliott with him), for the appellant.—The question is whether this case comes within the second clause of section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, which enacts that "if any person so licensed, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of any persons so licensed, shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence," it shall be lawful for the justices to grant a licence to the new tenant or occupier of the house. The respondent justices say it does not, because Hacker, at the time when he removed from the house, was not a person so licensed, the licence having then expired. But the words "any person so licensed" do not necessarily mean a person who was so licensed at the date of the removal; according to their natural interpretation they merely mean a person who has been licensed. It is obvious that, in the case where the executors of a "person so licensed" have removed from the house, "the person so licensed" cannot possibly have been a licensed person at the date of the removal. And there is no reason for so limiting the meaning of the word in the case where the person himself has removed from the house. There is the further question whether the second clause of the section applies in any case where the licence has expired at the time when the application under the section is made. The section is clearly intended to include some cases in which the licence has expired, as, for instance, those to which the words of the third clause are applicable: "If the occupier of any such house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted or shall have neglected to apply at the general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, for a licence to continue to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house." The case of having neglected to apply for a new licence almost necessarily presupposes the expiration of the old licence. And accordingly it was held in Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire, 32 W. R. 20, 11 Q. B. D. 638, overruling Ex parte Todd, 3 Q. B. D. 407, 26 W. R. Dig. 126, that in such a case, notwithstanding the expiration of the licence, an application under the section might be made by a new occupier. There is no reason why a new occupier should not be equally entitled to apply under the section after the expiration of the licence, in a case to which the second clause is applicable—viz., where the last licence-holder has removed from or yielded up the possession of the house. The case of Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham has been practically overruled by Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire.

He also cited Baldwin v. Justices of Dover, [1892] 2 Q. B. 421, 41 W. R. Dig. 115; and Reg. v. Licensing Justices of Market Bosworth, 35 W. R. 734, and referred to section 53 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Low, K.C., and Travers Humphreys, for the respondent justices.

COLLINS, M.R.—The particular clause which we have to consider is the second clause of section 14 of the Alehouse, Act, 1828. It consists of two alternatives. The first alternative reads thus: "If any person so licensed shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence." The second alternative reads thus: "If the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of any person so licensed shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence." It is contended on the part of the appellant that the words "any person so licensed," in the first alternative, include a person who had been so licensed but was not so licensed at the time when he removed from the house. The argument is that the same words, when they occur after the words "heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns," in the second alternative, must of necessity include a person who was not licensed at the date of removal, and that it is reasonable to construe the words where they occur in the first alternative in the same way. But this very point was considered and decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham in the year 1872. It was there held that this clause of the section did not apply where the tenant who removed from the house was not a licensed person at the date of the removal. Unless that decision has been overruled by the Court of Appeal it is an authority governing the present case. It is suggested that it has been in substance overruled in the case Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire. At first sight there is an apparent difference in principle between the two cases. On consideration, however, it is clear that the later case was decided specially on the words of the third clause of section 14, which deals with a different contingency. The clause is as follows: "If the occupier of any such house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted or shall have neglected to apply at the general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, for a licence to continue to sell excisable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed in such house." Those words manifestly contemplate the possibility of a licence having expired before the application for a renewal is made; and the court held that the application might be granted, although it was not made till after the expiration of the period for which the old licence was in force. But the judges expressly declined to interfere with the earlier case of Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham, which was in fact treated in the argument as being good law. In my opinion this court would not now be justified in going de novo into the case of Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham and overruling it.

LAWFORD v. BILLERICAY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Rural district council—Agreement made by council with their engineer to report and prepare plans for a sewage scheme—Agreement not under seal—Remuneration claimed for services rendered—Contract to pay implied from acceptance of benefit—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 56 (1).

A rural district council employed the plaintiff as engineer in connection with a proposed sewage scheme. The plaintiff performed the services which he was from time to time required to perform, and the council had the benefit of his services. The contract was not under seal.

Held (reversing the decision of Darling, J.), that the plaintiff was entitled to recover remuneration for the services which he had rendered, although there was no contract under seal, because his services had been accepted by the council, and the whole consideration for payment was therefore executed.

Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, 21 L. J. Q. B. 349, and Nicholson v. Bradfield Union, 14 W. R. 731, L. R. 1 Q. B. 620, approved and followed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Darling, J., who held that the agreement for services, which the plaintiff had rendered to the defendant rural district council, not being under their seal, was one that could not be enforced.

The facts were these: In July, 1899, the plaintiff was retained by an agreement under the common seal of the defendants to act as engineer on their behalf for certain sewage works they were about to carry out in the parishes of Shenfield and Hutton. Those works were completed, when the attention of the defendants was called to the fact that the drainage of a portion of their district known as Shenfield Common, which was outside the scope of the original scheme, was unsatisfactory, and the sewage committee were asked to consider the question of extending the original scheme so as to include this additional area. The committee by resolution directed the plaintiff to go to Shenfield Common, make an inspection and report as to the probable cost. This he did, and having made a report, subsequently wrote to the clerk of the defendant council "I presume that the agreement between your council and myself for the Shenfield and Hutton scheme will cover the Shenfield Common extension. I am willing that it should be so, but only on the understanding that half the commission, together with other fees than due, shall be paid within two months of the loan being sanctioned. This can either be indorsed on the agreement or added in the form of a letter from you on behalf of the council." The clerk in his reply informed the plaintiff that the payment of his fees should apply to the Shenfield Common extension, but with no variation.

The acts of the committee were all duly confirmed by the council.

The plaintiff duly performed the services which he was asked from time to time to perform, and the sanction of the Local Government Board was ultimately obtained for the scheme. Tenders were advertised for, but none were accepted.

The plaintiff claimed to be paid his account, and would have been paid had not a question arisen as to the rate of commission he was entitled to charge for part of the work he had performed. The parties being unable to agree as to the amount, the defendants took up the position that as the plaintiff at law could recover nothing by reason of the agreement being unsealed, they were entitled, he having refused their terms, to decline to pay him at all.

The plaintiff then brought his action, which was heard by Darling, J., and dismissed.

The plaintiff appealed.

Section 56 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73) is material and is as follows: "A parish or district council may appoint committees, consisting either wholly or partly of members of the council, for the exercise of any powers which, in the opinion of the council, can be properly exercised by committees, but a committee shall not hold office beyond the next annual meeting of the council, and the acts of every such committee shall be submitted to the council for their approval. Provided that where a committee is appointed by any district council for any of the purposes of the Public Health Acts or Highway Acts, the council may authorize the committee to institute any proceeding or do any act which the council might have instituted or done for that purpose, other than the raising of any loan or the making of any rate or contract."

C. A. Russell, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and Montague Lush, K.C., for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in dismissing the action, because this is a case which falls within the exceptions to the rule that a corporation can only contract under seal. One of the recognized exceptions to that rule is that where the purposes for which a corporation is created render it necessary that goods shall be supplied or work done for such purposes, and goods are supplied or work done, and the corporation gets the benefit thereof, the corporation is under an implied promise to pay and no seal is necessary. That is established by the following cases: Hall v. Swansea Corporation, 5 Q. B. 526; Sanders v. St. Neot's Union, 8 Q. B. 810; Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, 21 L. J. Q. B. 349; Haigh v. North Brierley Union, 6 W. R. 679, E. B. & E. 873, 28 L. J. Q. B. 62; and De Grave v. Monmouth Corporation, 4 C. & P. 111. The general rule as to this exception is fully stated by Wightman, J., in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, and that decision has been approved in subsequent cases and was adopted by Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Queen's Bench in Nicholson v. Bradfield Union, 14 W. R. 731, L. R. 1 Q. B. 620, and referred to again by that learned judge in Young v. Leamington Corporation, 31 W. R. 925, 8 App. Cas. 517. Where a plaintiff is driven to rely on an express contract a seal is necessary; but not in the case where the law will infer a contract. Here the committee who were duly authorized in that behalf, and whose acts were subsequently approved by the council, ordered the work to be done, and the council took the benefit of it. In Doe d. Pennington v. Taniere, 12 Q. B. 998, which was brought to decide a similar question that arose as to the validity of a demise by a corporation not under seal, Denman, J., said: "To enforce an executory contract against a corporation it might be necessary to show that it was by deed; but where the corporation have acted upon an executed contract, it is to be presumed against them that everything has been done that was necessary to make a binding contract upon both parties." A seal, moreover, was not necessary in this case, because the matter was referred to a committee and they made the contract with the plaintiff. A district council can so delegate its powers to a committee by section 56 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, which enacts that when confirmed by the council the contracts made by the committee shall be binding, and being the contracts of the committee could not be under seal. The decisions with regard to urban sanitary authorities such as Hunt v. Wimbledon Local Board, 27 W. R. 123, 4 C. P. D. 48, have no application, for the Public Health Act, 1875, expressly requires that every contract made by an urban authority, the amount of which exceeds £50, must be under seal, but there is no such provision as to rural district councils.

They also cited Church v. Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co., 6 A. & E. 846; Ludlow Corporation v. Charlton, 6 M. & W. 815; Arnold v. Poole Corporation, 4 Man. & G. 860; Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson, 5 Man. & G. 131; Paine v. Strand Union, 8 Q. B. 326; Lamprell v. Billericay Union, 3 Exch. 283; Lowe v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 18 Q. B. 632; Smart v. West Ham Union, 4 W. R. 301, 10 Exch. 867; London Dock Co. v. Sinnott, 6 W. R. 165, 8 E. & B. 347; Kidderminster Corporation v. Hardwick, 22 W. R. 160, L. R. 9 Ex. 13; Dyte v. St. Pancras Union, 27 L. T. Rep. 342; Austin v. Bethnal Green Union, 22 W. R. 406, L. R. 9 C. P. 91; and Stevens v. Hounslow Burial Board, 38 W. R. 236, 61 L. T. Rep. 839.

Macmorran, K.C., and Naldrett, for the respondent council.—The decision of Darling, J., was in accordance with the weight of authority and should be supported. Whether the plaintiff is suing upon an express contract or upon a quantum meruit for work done at the request of the defendants, it is equally necessary to render the defendants liable that the contract should be sealed. The committee can make no valid contract until the proposed contract has been ratified by the council: see Local Government Act, 1894, s. 56 (1). The contract therefore must be treated as being made by the council and not by the committee. It is contained in two letters which would amount to evidence of a binding contract, no doubt, if the parties had both been private individuals, but the defendant being a body corporate, the contract cannot be enforced because it has not received the seal of the corporation. We do not challenge the plaintiff's statement that there are cases, well established, in which a corporation has been held liable on a contract not under seal; but in all the exception cases the reason, wanting here, is clearly to be seen and shortly may be stated thus: That in all cases of convenience amounting almost to necessity in which if the carrying out of the contract had to be delayed until it could be put into writing and sealed, the purposes for which the corporation was created might be defeated; or in cases of trival matters or matters of constant occurrence, then the necessity of a seal is dispensed with. It is not suggested here that the circumstances were such that there was no time to enter into a contract under seal with the plaintiff. He desires to prove an exception to an exception. That is the position taken up by the defendants, and we say that the appointment of an engineer to carry out certain works and to be remunerated on certain terms is a contract that can only be enforced if it is under seal.

Lush, K.C., in reply.—It is true that the committee cannot themselves make a contract, but they can initiate one which, when confirmed and adopted by the council, becomes by the provisions of section 56 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, binding on the rural council: Firth v. Staines, 45 W. R. 575, [1897] 2 Q. B. 70. If the term "contract" includes getting assistance for the purpose of carrying out the matter delegated to the committee, the delegation is futile, for when they take any steps it would be said they were exceeding their powers. There is an implied legal obligation to pay arising from the doing of work at the request and the acceptance of the benefit of that work, that obligation being imposed by common law, and no contract is necessary; therefore a seal is not necessary.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an action in which the plaintiff makes a claim against the defendants, the Billericay Rural District Council, for money alleged to be "due from the defendants to the plaintiff under an agreement by the defendants to employ the plaintiff as their engineer, and for services rendered by the plaintiff at the defendants' request, and also damages for breach of the said agreement." That is the claim indorsed upon the writ. Then, in the statement of claim, the plaintiff claims, among other claims, upon a quantum meruit for services rendered at the defendants' request. The defence, so far as we have to deal with it here, is the absence of a seal from the agreement. We have now to consider whether that is a good defence. The action was tried before Darling, J., and the learned judge came to the conclusion that the want of the seal constituted a good defence. We have now to say whether that judgment was right. The learned judge was in a less advantageous position than we are in this court, because this is a case on which there are many authorities, generally in the courts of first instance, and not of the Exchequer Chamber or Court of Appeal, and he had not power to overrule any of the decisions, but had to try to reconcile the decisions and arrive at a conclusion from them. We, however, have power to overrule any of those cases if we do not approve of them, except, of course, any case in the House of Lords. There is no direct authority upon the matter in the House of Lords, for Lord Blackburn, in Young v. Leamington Corporation, distinctly left open the question which is raised in this case, and said that it was desirable that the whole question should be dealt with by the Court of Appeal. I propose now to try to do so.

The choice in this case really is whether we consider that we ought to follow the case of Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, or whether we ought to follow the cases which are inconsistent with that case. Now, in Nicholson v. Bradfield Union these cases are dealt with at considerable length. That case was argued by Sir Richard Harington, and in the course of his argument (L. R. 1 Q. B., at p. 622), we find that he marshalled the authorities upon the one side and the other with very great care. First, there is set forth the list of cases in which the rule based upon the assumption that in a case like this the corporation must contract under seal, and then there is set forth the list of the cases to the contrary, and among them the case of Clarke v. Cuckfield Union. Now, before I say anything further about the authorities, I wish to point out that this is the case of a rural district council. The rural district council appointed a committee and referred some matters to that committee to deal with, and it is desirable that I should state my view as to the legal position in this case, having regard to the provisions of the statute which governs the matter. The statute in question is the Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73). I will remark in passing that, as far as I can understand this statute, with respect to the power of delegation, it rather diminishes than increases the power which was previously given by the Public Health Act, 1875. Now, section 56 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, deals with this matter, and runs thus: [His lordship read the section, and, continuing, said:] According to the view which I take of the matter, that section does not authorize any council to empower a committee to do any act which is covered by the excepting clause—that is, it does not authorize any council to empower a committee to make any contract. Besides that, it seems to me that in this case not only had the council no power to authorize the committee to make a contract, but also, in my judgment, the committee did not in fact purport to make any contract on behalf of the council. For both these reasons I think that we must deal with the matter as if the contract alleged were a contract by the council, and not deal with it as if the contract were made by the committee. As I understand the argument on behalf of the plaintiff upon this section, it was that this was a case in which, if the question were whether there was a contract by the council, the answer might be in the negative because there was no seal; but that this was not such a case, because we have here to deal with a contract by a committee which has since been confirmed by the council; and that under those circumstances there was no necessity at all for a seal. For the reasons I have given that argument cannot succeed; first, because of the exceptions in the proviso to the section, and secondly, because I do not think that the committee purported to make a contract on behalf of the council. I must therefore deal with this case upon the basis that the question is whether the council has so contracted or so acted as to bind itself.

Having said that, I will turn to the question which we have really to decide, and turning to the cases I find that Blackburn, J., at the conclusion of his judgment in Nicholson v. Bradfield Union, says: "The case of Clarke v. Cuckfield Union is on its facts undistinguishable from the present case. We are aware that very high authorities have questioned the soundness of that decision, and, as pointed out in the judgment in that case, there are prior decisions of the Court of Exchequer which it is difficult to reconcile with it. We think, however, that as far as it extends to such a case as the present at least, the case was rightly decided; there may be cases in which the circumstances are different from those in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union and the present case, and which would still be governed by the principles laid down in the decisions in the Exchequer; those we leave to be decided when they arise, but so far as those prior decisions are inconsistent with the decision in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, we prefer to follow the authority of Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, which we think founded on justice and convenience." In that view of Blackburn, J., I entirely agree. I think that the decision in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union and the other cases cited before us, which were decided upon the same lines, ought to be preferred to the contrary decisions. I may mention before I leave the case of Nicholson v. Bradfield Union that it was a case of the supply of coals from time to time to the guardians, for the use of their workhouse, by the plaintiff, and that it was a case as to which it was very difficult to say that it was a matter of convenience or of such frequent occurrence that there was not any necessity for contracting under seal. The case, as I understand it, was decided really on the basis that, the coals having been supplied to and accepted by the defendants, thereupon the law raised an implied contract, from the supply and the acceptance by the corporation, to pay for the coals, and that the contract being thus a contract implied from acts, the defence founded upon the want of a seal was not available. I do not understand that case as having been decided on the old recognized exceptions of necessity or convenience, but as decided purely upon there being an implied contract to pay raised by implication of law upon the acceptance of goods supplied. That was the view taken by Wightman, J., in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union, and I will read a passage from his judgment from which that appears. After having pointed out the conflict of opinion that existed in the various decisions, he said: "I greatly regret the present state of the law upon a subject so important. It would, perhaps, have been better, and have avoided the uncertainty which now exists, if the old rule had never been relaxed; but being as it is, the question is whether the demand in question comes within any of the recognized exceptions to the general rule. I am disposed to think it does, and that wherever the purposes for which a corporation is created render it necessary that work should be done or goods supplied to carry such purposes into effect, as in the case of the guardians of a poor law union, and orders are given at a board regularly constituted and having general authority to make contracts for work or goods necessary for the purposes for which the corporation was created, and the work is done or goods supplied or accepted by the corporation, and the whole consideration is executed, the corporation cannot keep the goods or the benefit and refuse to pay on the ground that, though the members of the corporation who ordered the goods or work were competent to make a contract and bind the rest, the formality of a deed or of affixing the seal were wanting, and then say, 'No action lies; we are not competent to make a parol contract; and we avail ourselves of our own disability.'"

It seems to me that there again the exception based upon the contract being one arising upon the receipt of the benefit of acts done at the request of a corporate body is recognized in the same way as it was recognized subsequently by Blackburn, J., in Nicholson v. Bradfield Union.

There is another authority which equally directly recognizes this exception as one of the exceptions to the rule that contracts of corporations must be under seal. That case is Haigh v. North Brierley Union, in which Erle, J., said: "I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The question is one rather of fact than of law. Sanders v. St. Neot's Union and Clarke v. Cuckfield Union seem to me to have decided that an action lies against the guardians of a union to recover money for work and labour, though performed under a contract not under seal; and the grounds for that decision are elaborately stated by my brother Wightman in the latter of these two cases"; and then he cited the passage which I have already read from the judgment of Wightman, J. I ought, however, to call attention to the judgment of Crompton, J., in Haigh v. North Brierley Union, who apparently took the view that if all the work had been done under one antecedent contract a seal might have been necessary. It is not necessary to express any opinion upon that point, for it does not apply to the present case, where there was no single antecedent order but a series of orders, further than to say that I am of opinion that in this case there was no one contract or order which overrode all, but that there was a series of small orders given for the work which was done by the plaintiff. Having expressed this view preferring the decisions which follow the line of reasoning in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union to the opposite series of decisions, I do not think that it is necessary for me to say anything more about the various authorities which have been cited. I will, however, mention the case of Young v. Leamington Corporation, but only for the purpose of saying that this question was to a certain extent dealt with by Lord Blackburn in delivering his opinion. Though he does not say so in plain and definite terms, it seems to me that Lord Blackburn did prefer the cases which followed Clarke v. Cuckfield Union to the cases which were opposed to it—that is, he adhered to his view expressed in Nicholson v. Bradfield Union. At all events it can safely be said that, the passage from the judgment in Nicholson v. Bradfield Union having been cited in the House of Lords, and especially the passage from the judgment of Blackburn, J., not one word can be found from any one of the learned lords which casts any doubt upon that which Blackburn, J., had said.

Before I leave this matter I wish to say that this view, that contracts may be implied after the consideration has been executed and the benefit accepted, undoubtedly has been held in a variety of cases, cases in which it was held that no seal was necessary. It was not denied in argument that that would be true in an action for money had and received. It could not be denied that it would be true in an action for goods sold and delivered. That was decided in De Grave v. Monmouth Corporation, which is referred to in several of the subsequent cases as being a case of authority. Then there is the case which arose frequently of an action of indebitatus assumpsit for use and occupation; and there are also the cases in which the corporation was not suing, but the tenant was suing the corporation on the basis of his position as the tenant of the corporation. In the argument in the present case, as in several of the old cases, it was attempted to explain these authorities upon the basis that they were all cases in which the matters were either trivial, or of daily occurrence, or urgent necessity, so that the absence of a seal could be justified under the well-recognized exception. But, as was pointed out by Mr. Lush, if one limits the exception in cases of executed consideration in that way, the real effect is that one does not give any effect to the exception at all; it only leaves the matter just as it was before. Quite independently of this exception, and taking only the old exception, a seal would not be necessary, and therefore it would have been unnecessary to fall back upon an implied contract arising from an executed consideration. I do not know that it is really necessary for me to go now at any greater length into the matter. I would like, however, to point out that the exception based upon an executed consideration is not one of recent origin, because it was stated by Lord Denman, C.J., in Doe d. Pennington v. Taniere, where he said: "To enforce an executory contract against a corporation it might be necessary to show that it was by deed; but, where the corporation have acted as upon an executed contract, it is to be presumed against them that everything has been done that was necessary to make it a binding contract upon both parties, they having had all the advantage they would have had if the contract had been regularly made. This is by no means inconsistent with the rule that, in general, a corporation can only contract by deed; and it is merely raising a presumption against them, from their acts, that they have contracted in such a manner as to be binding upon them, whether by deed or otherwise." Although expressed in different language I think that Lord Denman in effect meant to say that a person can rely as against a corporation upon a contract based upon an executed consideration. Under the circumstances of this case I think that our proper course is to differ from the judgment of Darling, J., and to give judgment in favour of the plaintiff. My judgment is based entirely upon the principles which I understand to have been laid down by Wightman, J., in Clarke v. Cuckfield Union and by Erle, J., in Haigh v. North Brierley Union.

Company—Debentures—Extension of time—Winding up before registration—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 43), ss. 14, 15.

An order was made under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, extending the time for registering a charge created by a trust deed on certain debentures until a date fourteen days after the making of the order, but "without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such trust deed and debentures shall be actually registered." Ten days after the order was made the company passed a resolution for voluntary winding up. On the fourteenth day after the order was made the charge was duly registered.

Such registration held not to make the debenture-holders secured creditors as against the general body of creditors, whose rights were protected by the form of the order.

On the 25th of June, 1901, the Anglo-Oriental Carpet Manufacturing Co. executed a trust deed conveying certain property to trustees to secure the principal and interest agreed to be paid by certain debentures and charging its business and undertaking and other assets by way of a floating charge with repayment of the principal and interest secured or to be secured by such debentures, and on the same day issued a series of debentures. These securities were not registered as required by the Companies Act, 1900, s. 14.

On the 11th of October, 1901, notice was issued convening a meeting for the 21st of October to pass an extraordinary resolution for voluntary winding up. The meeting was adjourned until the 11th of November.

On the 1st of November an order was made extending the time for registration of the trust deed and debentures, until the 15th of November, "without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such trust deeds and debentures shall be actually registered."

On the 11th of November an extraordinary resolution for voluntary winding up was passed, and on the 15th of November the charge created by the trust deed and debentures was duly registered.

The liquidator issued an originating summons in the winding up to obtain the decision of the court whether, as against the general body of creditors, the debenture-holders were secured creditors.

Norton, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for unsecured creditors.

BUCKLEY, J., said that immediately upon the commencement of the winding up it became the duty of the liquidator to collect the assets and divide them among the then existing creditors. At that moment, in the absence of any registration of their security, the debenture-holders were unsecured creditors. The order extending the time for registration under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, was made "without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such trust deed and debentures shall be actually registered," and these words, whatever their precise limits, clearly included and saved the right which the creditors acquired on the passing of the winding-up resolution to have the assets realized and distributed among them pari passu.

In making the order in the above form in In re Joplin Brewery Co., 50 W. R. 75, [1902] 1 Ch. 79, he had no intention of deciding what class of creditors would be protected by the words employed, and he could not derive from the order of the Court of Appeal in In re Johnson & Co., any assistance in ascertaining the class of creditors who ought to be protected by the order in a case like the present. The words employed in the order in the latter case appeared to have exactly the same effect as those used in the Joplin Brewery case; in the Joplin Brewery case there were two classes of creditors only to be considered—(a) those who were asking for the order, and (b) other creditors. In In re Johnson & Co. there were three classes to be considered—(a) those who were asking for the order; (b) others who were contractually entitled to rank pari passu with class (a); and (c) other creditors. The contractual rights of classes (a) and (b) inter se required the insertion of special provisions; but as between classes (a) and (b) on the one hand, and class (c) on the other, the relevant words were simply "without prejudice to any rights . . .

which may have been or may be acquired against the holders of the said debentures . . . prior to the time when the last-mentioned debentures shall be actually registered." These words were in effect the same as those used in the Joplin Brewery case, for the only difference in wording, the insertion of "against the holders of the said debentures," made no difference in effect, for the right given by statute to the creditor, was a right as against the holders of unregistered debentures.

The case was, however, in his view, covered by the decision in In re S. Abrahams & Sons, 50 W. R. 284, [1902] 1 Ch. 695, and the suggestion made by Stirling, L.J., when considering the form of order submitted in In re Johnson & Co., [1902] 2 Ch., at p. 110.

WELD-BLUNDELL v. WOLSELEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Settlement—Waste—Timber—Equitable waste—Ornamental timber—Intention of settlor—Inference from existing circumstances.

Where, in an action for an injunction by a remainderman under a settlement of real estate to restrain a tenant for life not impeachable for waste from cutting timber, the plaintiff adduces some evidence that some of the timber which is being cut by the defendant (the tenant for life) was either originally planted or was left standing for the purpose of ornament or shelter, by the settlor, the plaintiff has made out a primâ facie case for an injunction on the ground of equitable waste, which the defendant must answer.

Special case.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. From the case stated the following facts appeared:

By an indenture of settlement, made the 11th of September, 1869, between Edward Joseph Weld (since deceased) of the first part, Reginald Joseph Weld (the eldest son of the said E. J. Weld) of the second part, and Walter Weld and John Joseph Middleton (trustees) of the third part, the Lulworth estate was settled (inter alia) to the use of the said R. J. Weld and his assigns during his life without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over. At the date of these proceedings the plaintiff, Charles Joseph Weld-Blundell, was contingently entitled under the settlement to an estate for life in remainder. He was also tenant of Lulworth Castle under a lease. The said R. J. Weld (who was, and had been since the death of his father in 1877, tenant for life in possession of the Lulworth estate) was a person of unsound mind, so found by inquisition, and two of the defendants—namely, Edward Talbot Wolseley and Agnes Frances Weld, were the committees of his estate; the other defendants, Henry Duke & Son, were auctioneers employed by the committees.

During the winter 1901-1902 the defendants Duke & Son, acting on the instructions of the other defendants, marked for felling certain trees (540 or thereabouts in number) standing on the said Lulworth estate, and 78 or thereabouts of such 540 trees were accordingly felled.

This action was commenced on the 17th of February, 1902, and by his statement of claim the plaintiff claimed (inter alia) an injunction to restrain the defendants from felling or removing any of the said trees.

Copies of the writ of summons and the pleadings in the action were to be taken as part of the case.

By an order of the court dated the 27th of October, 1902, made upon a motion, the hearing whereof was by consent treated as the trial of the action, the court declared that an agreement for a reference contained in certain letters therein specified was binding on the parties. And it was by consent ordered that a special referee should be appointed in manner therein mentioned to make an inquiry and report to the court which of the said 540 trees had properly been or might properly be felled by the defendants, and which of the said trees ought properly to have been or ought properly to be left by the defendants standing.

Copies of the said order and the letters therein specified were to be taken as part of the case.

In pursuance of the said order the Hon. Cecil F. Parker was appointed special referee.

The inquiry was proceeded with, and on the 12th of February, 1903 (the day appointed by the special referee), the Hon. Gerald Lascelles, deputy surveyor of the New Forest and the Crown lands in Hampshire (the only witness called) was examined in support of the plaintiff's case.

A transcript of the shorthand note of his evidence was initialled by the referee, and was to be taken as part of the case.

The said witness having been examined the plaintiff's case was closed by his counsel, and thereupon counsel for the defendants submitted that no evidence had been given that any of the said 540 trees were trees which the defendants were not entitled to fell and might not properly fell, and that no case had been made by the plaintiff requiring an answer by the defendants. It was contended on their behalf that in the absence of evidence that any of the said trees had been planted or designedly left for ornament by the settlor through whom the plaintiff claimed the defendants were entitled to fell all the said trees, and that no such evidence had been given. Counsel for the plaintiff contending to the contrary, the referee was requested by counsel for the defendants, and agreed, to state a case for the opinion of the court before proceeding to hear any evidence on behalf of the defendants. The question submitted for the opinion of the court was: Whether any evidence had been given upon which, in the absence of any evidence on behalf of the defendants, the referee could properly find and report that any of the said 540 trees were such as might not properly be felled by the defendants.

Neville, K.C., and Barnard Lailey, for the defendants—The deputy surveyor in his evidence says it is impossible not to come to the conclusion that the woods in question were planted for ornament and shelter. But it is not enough to say that they were planted for those purposes at some former period. There must be some evidence that the settlor himself either actually planted them or allowed them to remain with that intention. [SWINFEN EADY, J.—Suppose an ornamental avenue of elms, leading up to a mansion-house, and standing for perhaps 150 years. What evidence could you have of the intention with which the trees were planted?] There must be some evidence before the court will interfere with the legal rights of a limited owner—rights which exist where, as in this case, he is unimpeachable of waste, and the settlement says nothing about equitable waste. Those rights cannot be taken away by merely proving that the trees are in fact ornamental; the question is what the settlor considered ornamental; but no doubt less evidence would be required in the case of an avenue. [SWINFEN EADY, J.—There the fact would speak for itself.] But even in the case of an avenue the primâ facie evidence might be rebutted if it could be proved that the trees had been treated as marketable timber. If the plaintiff's contention is right you have only to prove the present ornamental character.

They cited Marquis of Downshire v. Sandys, 6 Ves. (2nd ed., 1827) 107; Wombwell v. Belasyse (cited, 6 Ves., p. 110*a*); Marker v. Marker, 9 Hare 1; Halliwell v. Phillips, 6 W. R. 408, 4 Jur. N. S. 607; Chamberlayne v. Dummer, 3 Bro. C. C. 549.

Eve, K.C., and Leigh Clare, for the plaintiff.—The only way to ascertain the intention of the settlor is by inference from existing circumstances. If the woods are clearly suitable for ornament and shelter it is fair to assume they have been planted for those purposes, and it is the same as to subsequent dealings. A man receives an estate in a particular condition—say, with ornamental timber. Is not his retention of that timber a proof that he retains it for the purpose of ornament? From such circumstances the court can infer the intention of the settlor: Lushington v. Boldero, 6 Madd. 149.

Neville, K.C., replied.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The issue before the referee was entirely a question of fact. He heard the evidence on one side and has submitted to the court the question of law whether there is any case for the defendants to answer. I am told the referee was selected by reason of his special qualifications and that he has viewed the woods in question, but the special case contains no reference to his having done so.

It has often been said that the question whether any trees have been planted, or left, for ornamental purposes is a question of fact. The main difference in different cases lies in the evidence necessary to establish that fact. There is often great difficulty in saying what constitutes ornamental timber. It may be that nearness to a mansion-house is a sufficient indication, but neither this nor the existence of a park is a necessary element. Mr. Neville says some evidence is requisite that the settlor intended to treat the timber as ornamental, or that he considered it was planted for shelter. There is evidence to show that in Mr. Lascelles' opinion at least some of the woods were designedly planted for shelter. With regard to the Kennel Rings and the pleasure-grounds there, he says he thinks they were planted as part of one scheme to shelter that amphitheatre in which the lake and castle are, and for residential purposes, and (as to a part of them) that they were of great use for shelter. With regard to Kennel Wood he expressed the opinion that it was planted later when they found more shelter was required. These trees were of various ages, some oaks being about 150 years old, and some larch about forty years. These latter would therefore have been planted shortly before the date of the settlement of the 11th of September, 1869. Kennel Wood may be taken as an example of trees possibly planted or left by the settlor for purposes of shelter.

It has been urged that with regard to the way some of the woods were treated, especially as to the great thinning that took place, there is good indication how far the settlor himself treated them as ornamental, but though thinning was extensively done in the Bowling Green Wood, there is no evidence of such thinning elsewhere. As to the drives through some of the woods, though they may have been originally, or at some time, pleasure drives, they are not so now. But there is quite sufficient evidence on the part of the plaintiff to call for an answer from the defendants, not indeed as to all the trees—but even if it be so as to some only, there can be but one answer to the special case. Turner, L.J., in Micklethwait v. Micklethwait, 5 W. R. 861, 1 De G. & J. 504, at p. 524, says, speaking of a settlor or devisor: "If by his disposition or by his acts he has indicated an intention that there should be a continuous enjoyment in succession of that which he has himself enjoyed, in the state in which he has himself enjoyed it, it must surely be against conscience that a tenant for life claiming under his disposition should, by the exercise of a legal power, defeat that intention. We have here, I think, the clue by which the difficulty of this case can be solved. If a devisor or settlor occupies a mansion-house with trees planted or left standing for ornament around or about it, or keeps such a mansion-house in a state for occupation, and devises or settles it so as to go in a course of succession, he may reasonably be presumed to anticipate that those who are to succeed him will occupy the mansion-house, and it cannot be presumed that he meant it to be denuded of that ornament which he has himself enjoyed. This court therefore in such a case protects the trees against the acts of the tenant for life."

The issue for the court to determine is not whether the timber is now ornamental, but whether it was planted or left by the owners of the estate for the purpose of ornament or shelter, and this as to some of the trees is proved by the evidence. I am of opinion, accordingly, that the special case ought to be answered in the affirmative.

BRADLEY AND ANOTHER v. CARRITT. (a.)

Mortgage—Redemption—Clog on equity of redemption—Collateral advantage to mortgagee—Advantage continuing after redemption — Mortgage of shares — Employment of mortgagee as broker.

Collateral stipulations in a mortgage cease to operate on redemption, so that a mortgage security cannot validly provide that the mortgagee shall obtain any advantage which arises after or goes beyond the time when the principal, costs, and interest are repaid, for such would be a fetter upon the mortgagor's right to redeem.

Where, therefore, a holder of shares in a tea company mortgaged them to secure an advance, and at the same time agreed to use his best endeavours to secure that the mortgagee should always thereafter have the sale of all the company's teas as broker, and the mortgage was paid off.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (49 W. R. 593, [1901] 2 K. B. 550) reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) (49 W. R. 593, [1901] 2 K. B. 550), affirming a judgment of Bigham, J.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts are given at length in Lord Lindley's judgment. They are briefly summarized in the following statement:

In May, 1892, in consideration of an advance of £2,250 made by the respondent to the appellant, William Bradley, the said appellant, mortgaged to the respondent 1,500 odd shares in a tea company to secure repayment of the loan, and at the same time agreed to use his best endeavours to secure that the respondent should always thereafter have the sale of all the company's teas as broker, and he agreed in the event of the company's teas being sold otherwise to pay the respondent the amount of commission which he would have earned if the teas had been sold through him.

William Bradley's brother James, without being a mortgagee, entered into a similar agreement, that being of a subsidiary character in view of the majority of the House.

The loan was repaid, and the company having ceased to employ the respondent as broker, he brought the action to recover damages against the brothers for breach of the agreements.

At the trial the jury returned a verdict for respondent for £750, and Bigham, J., gave judgment accordingly.

This was upheld by the Court of Appeal holding that the collateral advantage secured to the mortgagee was one which might be bargained for.

The Bradleys appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Buckmaster, K.C., for the appellants.—The agreement must be confined to the continuance of the security. Where the principal debt, interest, and mortgagee's costs have been paid, the whole consideration is gone. The undertaking here constitutes a clog on the equity of redemption: Noakes v. Rice, 50 W. R. 305, [1902] A. C. 24. This appeal is almost identical with the Irish case—Browne v. Ryan [1901] 2 Ir. R. 653. Salt v. Marquis of Northampton, 40 W. R. 529, [1892] A. C. 1, affirmed the mortgagor's right on redemption to have back his property in its original form. Santley v. Wilde, 48 W. R. 90, [1899] 2 Ch. 474, was disapproved in Noakes v. Rice in this House.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the respondent.—Nothing unfair in this arrangement: Mainland v. Upjohn, 37 W. R. 411, 41 Ch. D. 126. The clog on the equity of redemption, if any, was personal.

They referred to Biggs v. Hoddinott, 47 W. R. 84, [1898] 2 Ch. 307.

Buckmaster, K.C., replied.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

May 11.—Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This appeal raises in a slightly different form, and with some difference of circumstance, the question which this House had to consider in the recent case of Noakes v. Rice. Your lordships, I think, have nothing to do now but to determine whether the distinction between the present case and the case of Noakes v. Rice, as finally decided, is or is not a solid and substantial difference leading to a different result. Other points, no doubt, were discussed at the bar, but the only effect of the discussion was to incumber and embarrass the argument on the one point which was really arguable. In my view, all these other points were and are immaterial, and I pass them by altogether.

The distinction between Noakes v. Rice and the case under review is brought out very clearly in the judgment of the Court of Appeal which was delivered by Stirling, L.J. It is, I need not say, a most careful judgment, to which little or nothing could be added by the learned counsel for the respondent. But if I am not mistaken, it shows some trace of the difficulties created by recent decisions and dicta of the Court of Appeal. And certainly it is only fair to bear in mind that at the time when it was delivered the case of Noakes v. Rice had not gone beyond the Court of Appeal, while the principles re-established, or definitely asserted by this House in Noakes v. Rice had been shaken and obscured by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Santley v. Wilde. I am aware that Lord Lindley, from whom I should never differ without the greatest hesitation and misgiving, still holds that Santley v. Wilde was rightly decided. My noble and learned friend will, I am sure, pardon me for saying that I am unable to concur in that view. I think the method of the judgment questionable, and the effect subversive of a settled doctrine of equity. Santley v. Wilde was the case of a mortgage to secure an advance of money. The loan was the occasion of the mortgage. The end and purpose of the mortgage was to secure the loan; and but for one stipulation in the mortgage deed the transaction would have been a matter of ordinary everyday occurrence. The mortgagee stipulated, of course, for repayment of principal, and for payment of interest properly so called. And by way of further remuneration for the accommodation afforded he stipulated for a share of the profits to be derived from the use of the mortgaged property, which happened to be a theatre held under lease for a term of years. Now that the usury laws have been repealed, there cannot, I think, be any objection to such a stipulation, provided it comes to an end when the mortgagee is paid principal, interest, and costs. But in Santley v. Wilde the stipulation was that the mortgagee should receive his share of profits after the mortgage was paid off during the continuance of the mortgagor's interest in the property, for the whole term of the lease. That stipulation was, as it seems to me, unquestionably part of the mortgage transaction. Well, the mortgagee calls in the loan. The mortgagor tenders principal, interest, share of profits up to date, and costs, and demands a re-assignment. This demand is refused. Then he brings an action for redemption. Reversing Byrne, J., the Court of Appeal held that the mortgagor was not entitled to redeem. The way by which the court arrived at that conclusion was this: "A mortgage," said the Master of the Rolls, "is a conveyance of land or an assignment of chattels as a security for the payment of a debt or the discharge of some other obligation for which it is given." I cannot help thinking that the double aspect which this definition apparently presents may have had something to do with the result. For the Court of Appeal proceeded to split up the mortgage transaction into two parts—a security for payment of the debt and a security for the discharge of an additional obligation. They said in effect, "The mortgagor may pay off the debt if he likes, but that will not discharge the mortgage. The mortgage will remain as a security for the performance of the obligation relating to the share of profits. As long as that obligation lasts the mortgage stands." The result, therefore, was, to use the words of Cozens-Hardy, J., that "the proviso for redemption was nugatory," because it only came into operation when there was "nothing on which it could operate." That seems to me to be a very far-reaching decision. It reduces the rule that a mortgage cannot be made irredeemable to a dead letter. You have only to tack on some stipulation, such as men of business might well agree to if there were no mortgage, and the thing is done. In Noakes v. Rice the mortgagee suffered, it would seem, merely because his legal advisers had the misfortune to know a little law, and had not learned the secret of Santley v. Wilde. They thought they could make the covenant on which they meant to rely run with the land. If they had not puzzled over a matter which is often one of some difficulty—if they had only inserted a covenant to the effect that the mortgagor and his assigns should get their beer from the mortgagee, and from no one else, so long as the lease lasted, and if the proviso for redemption had been so expressed as to cover that obligation, the mortgage, according to Santley v. Wilde, would have been irredeemable and the covenant open to no objection.

Now, what was the Court of Appeal to do when it was confronted by the decision in Santley v. Wilde, and at the same time warned by what was said in Biggs v. Hoddinott, that judges were not to go one step beyond what had been actually decided? I must say I think the court took the only course open to it.

It is observed in the judgment of the Court of Appeal that it has never been laid down that it is essential for the validity of what are called, not very happily, I think, collateral stipulations, that they should cease to operate on redemption. That is perfectly true. But it may be said with equal truth that, putting aside the case of Santley v. Wilde, there is no case to be found in the books from the earliest period to the present day in which a mortgagee after redemption ever attempted to keep on foot the benefit of any collateral stipulation which was part and parcel of the mortgage transaction. And that surely is far more significant. You could hardly expect to find in any judicial utterance a note of warning against an experiment which before Santley v. Wilde no one ever thought of trying. Then it is to be observed that it was the view of Cozens-Hardy, J., and of the Court of Appeal in Noakes v. Rice, that the covenant in question in that case imposed an actual burden on the land which was the subject of the mortgage. "The covenant," said Collins, L.J., "imposes a tie upon the house, not a personal restriction upon the mortgagor. Giving great weight to this circumstance, and intending, no doubt, to keep strictly within the line of decided cases, the learned judges of the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that a direct fetter on the equity of redemption, such as that which was supposed to exist in Noakes v. Rice, was not permissible, but that a fetter, or restriction operating indirectly, though it might have the same effect, was not open to objection, and, indeed, was sanctioned by principles said to have been laid down in Biggs v. Hoddinott.

The real question is whether this distinction can be supported. It is necessary, I think, to examine closely the reasoning on which the conclusion of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal was based. At the outset they were met by a passage in a former judgment of Rigby, L.J. "The property," said Rigby, L.J., in Noakes v. Rice, "which comes back to the mortgagor must not be worse than it was when it was mortgaged, and the mortgagee must not, either expressly or by implication, reserve to himself any hold upon the property after the time for redemption has arrived and the right of redemption has been put in force." That was very much what was said in this House when the case was before your lordships. And it is quite right so far as it goes. To that expression of opinion exception was taken. The words "by implication" are explained away by saying it is "an expression which we consider to have been used by Rigby, L.J., with reference to a class of cases in which the obligation takes the form of a penal sum or liquidated damages by way of penalty on the doing of a particular thing." I am not quite sure that I understand the force or application of that observation. Then the judgment goes on to observe, "It is said, however, that the shares, after redemption, are fettered, inasmuch as the stipulations into which the mortgagor had entered would prevent him from dealing so freely with his property as he otherwise would." Then follow these important words: "It is quite possible that an indirect effect of this nature may flow from these stipulations, but the same result would have followed if the stipulations had been entered into on the occasion of an advance being made by the plaintiff, to the defendant W. M. Bradley, on his personal security, and in that case the stipulation would, as it seems to us, be perfectly valid." There again I have some difficulty in following the reasoning of the Court of Appeal. I should not have supposed that any one would contend that the peculiar doctrines of equity applicable to mortgage transactions apply in all cases, whether there is a mortgage or not, and I rather doubt whether the circumstance that a stipulation is valid when it is not part of a mortgage transaction is an argument for its validity when it is.

The judgment concludes by repeating what was said at the outset: "There is no decision that such indirect effect of the stipulations brings them within the doctrine of equity under consideration, and so to hold would," it adds, "reduce the operation of the decision in Biggs v. Hoddinott within very narrow limits. For these reasons we think that the equity of redemption ought not in the present case to be held to be clogged."

I have stated, in the words of their judgment, the reasons which induced the learned judges of the Court of Appeal to decide against the present appellants. I doubt whether those reasons can be regarded as altogether satisfactory. As to the last reason, I must say, speaking for myself, that I am not sure that it would be a great misfortune if the operation of every decision were to be confined to the matter decided, and the principles on which the decision rests. Harm, I think, is sometimes done by general expressions, even in praise of a principle which everybody admires in the abstract, when they are not necessary for the purpose in hand. Though true in themselves, they are apt to be misunderstood owing to the connection in which they are found. One learned judge, we know, thought Santley v. Wilde was covered by Biggs v. Hoddinott, though the actual decision in Biggs v. Hoddinott does not, I think, touch the point raised in Santley v. Wilde. Biggs v. Hoddinott was a plain case. It purported to decide two things. In the first place, it purported to decide that a mortgage may be made irredeemable for a reasonable period. Well, everybody knows that when money was placed out on mortgage as an investment nothing was more common than to make the mortgage irredeemable for a certain limited time. It was an old and well established practice, and a very reasonable practice too. I do not understand that in the case of Teevan v. Smith, 30 W. R. 716, 20 Ch. D. 724, Jessel, M.R., treated the point as open to any possible doubt. He referred to it, I think, as a practice well understood and perfectly valid. The other matter which Biggs v. Hoddinott purported to decide was that a stipulation for additional remuneration during the continuance of the mortgage was valid. That, again, was a matter which was hardly open to question after the repeal of the usury laws. As Lord Davey pointed out in Noakes v. Rice, the additional remuneration is only interest in another form. Such a stipulation does not prevent the mortgagor getting back his property or impede or obstruct redemption.

It seems to me to be playing with words to say that on redemption these shares came back to Mr. Bradley no worse they were when he mortgaged them. If I part with property owing to a temporary necessity and the property is returned to me afterwards, do I get it back just as it was when it comes enveloped in an atmosphere of danger which was not present when I parted with it? Is it none the worse—is its usefulness to me unimpaired, if it now requires delicate handling and cautious treatment to prevent it becoming a source of mischief to its owner? Mr. Bradley could not have safely sold or mortgaged any of these shares when he got them back. True their value to a purchaser or a mortgagee would be just the same. But what would have been Mr. Bradley's position? We were told, and it seems to stand to reason, that the only market for shares of this description is to be found among tea brokers. Tea brokers want to get hold of shares in a tea company in order to have the sale of the company's teas. That means or points to the displacement of the acting broker. A change of brokers in Mr. Bradley's company would, if the respondent be right, necessarily expose Mr. Bradley to a heavy liability. The Court of Appeal says that is not enough; the mortgagee has not retained any direct hold upon the shares, though he may have indirectly brought about the same result. I do not think it is necessary that there should be any hold upon the property, direct or indirect. I think, as I ventured to say in Noakes v. Rice, that equity will not permit any device or contrivance designed or calculated to prevent or impede redemption. And I think your lordships gave sanction to that proposition when you approved the decision in the Irish case of Browne v. Ryan. Can you impose on the equity of redemption a fetter operating indirectly when you cannot, as it is admitted, impose a fetter which operates directly? I should have thought that that question answered itself—you cannot do indirectly that which you must not do directly.

The result, therefore, in my opinion, is that the judgment of the Court of Appeal cannot be maintained, and the action must fail so far as it regards Mr. W. M. Bradley. It fails too, I think, as regards Mr. James Bradley. His liability, in my opinion, was only secondary and subsidiary to his brother's liability. When Mr. Carritt, by his own act in calling in the loan, put an end to the liability of Mr. W. M. Bradley, the liability of Mr. James Bradley fell with it.

For the reasons I have given I move your lordships that the appeal be allowed and the action dismissed, and that the respondent do pay the costs both here and below.

Lord SHAND.—In this case I have had the advantage of reading and carefully considering the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Lindley, and I agree with him in thinking that the judgments of Bigham, J., and of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed. It is unnecessary for me to recapitulate the facts of the case, which have been fully stated by his lordship, and as I am in complete agreement with him in the grounds of judgment, I shall make only a few observations in addition.

In the case of James Bradley there is merely a reference to the loan which the plaintiff Mr. Carritt had given to his brother; and in consideration of this he agrees as a shareholder in the Sephinjuri Bheel Tea Co., and in every other capacity, that Mr. Carritt or any firm of brokers of which he shall for the time being be a partner "shall always hereafter have the sale of all the company's teas as broker, and in case of any of the company's teas being sold otherwise than through you or your firm I personally engage and agree to pay you the amount of the commission which you or your firm would have earned if the teas had been sold through you or your firm." This obligation is unconditional and simple. In respect of a loan given an obligation is granted, and not a word is added which can suggest the argument as to fettering or clogging the security afforded by the temporary transfer of shares in the case of his brother William McKenzie Bradley, in the action against him.

Then as regards William. After an acknowledgment of money lent, an obligation for repayment with interest, a bill, and a transfer of shares in the Sephinjuri Bheel Tea Co. as security, subject, of course, to a right of redemption on the repayment of the loan and interest, the agreement proceeds:

"4. I further agree as a shareholder in the Sephinjuri Bheel Tea Co. (Limited), and in every other capacity, to use my best endeavours to secure that you or any firm of brokers of which you for the time being shall be a partner (as you shall elect) shall always have the sale of all the company's teas as broker." With this addition: "And in the event of any of the company's teas being sold otherwise than through you or your firm, I personally engage and agree to pay to you or your firm the amount of the commission which you or your firm would have earned if the teas had been sold through you or your firm."

I confess I think it was unfortunate for the law that the rule, now called a principle, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage," with all its consequences, was ever carried further than was necessary for the purpose of relieving borrowers from forfeiture of their property on non-payment of the sum lent on a fixed day. I strongly agree with the expressions of opinion of Lord Bramwell in the case of Salt v. Marquis of Northampton, of Bowen, L.J., and Lord Lindley, Chitty, L.J., and the present Master of the Rolls in the case of Biggs v. Hoddinott, that in agreements and obligations which cannot be represented to be unconscionable, or to have been procured by fraud or undue influence, and which are expressed in clear language quite understood by the parties who have entered into them, effect should be given to the terms used, having regard to the true nature of their bargain. The origin of the rule is, however, to be traced, I believe, not to its natural and reasonable meaning in itself, but to the provisions of the usury laws which existed when it was introduced. "Once a mortgage always a mortgage," however, had, and I think still has, down to the present date, application only where the power of redemption by repayment of the loan is itself fettered or clogged by conditions which prevent full redemption even where such repayment is made or offered. And I agree with Lord Lindley in holding that this is not a case of that class, and that where, as here, redemption can be fully obtained by repayment of the loan and interest, a separate obligation for a different or collateral advantage to the lender is valid and enforceable.

It was argued that by article 4 of the agreement Mr. William Bradley became bound to remain for all time a shareholder of the Sephinjuri Bheel Tea Co., and that this obligation was a fetter on his right to redeem his shares and to dispose of them, which by agreement affected the shares as his property even after the redemption of the loan. I am clearly of opinion that there was no such obligation undertaken either expressly or by implication. If he continued to be a shareholder, no doubt he undertook to use his influence in that character to continue Mr. Carritt as broker; but he was quite free to sell his shares, as he was also free to redeem them on repayment of the loan. The true force of the agreement was contained in the entirely separate obligation that if the company's teas should be sold otherwise than through

Mr. Carritt's firm, he nevertheless personally bound himself to pay the broker's commission to Mr. Carritt or his firm. It may be assumed that if he had not agreed to grant that obligation he would not have obtained the loan. By the agreement there was no restraint, fetter, or impediment on the power to redeem the mortgage. On payment of principal and interest Mr. William Bradley was entitled to have the mortgage entirely discharged or redeemed, and to recover the subject of the mortgage exactly as he had previously possessed it. The case is entirely distinguished from such a case as that of Noakes v. Rice, or similar cases, where, even after repayment of the principal and interest of the loan, the subject of the security still remained fettered by the condition that it was by the agreement to be a tied house. So in all the cases which have occurred in which the rule "Once a mortgage always a mortgage" has been enforced, the subject of the mortgage, notwithstanding the redemption by repayment of principal and interest remained in some way fettered. Here the merely personal obligation to continue to pay commission on the withdrawal of the business of selling the teas in no way affects the subject of the security. The obligation was entirely separable and separate from anything relating to the subject of the security, which was Mr. Bradley's shares in the company, and there is no reason for holding that the obligation is in any way invalid. It appears to me, on my construction of the agreement, that if the appellants are to succeed in their present argument, the rule of law said to be founded on equity must henceforth not be merely "Once a mortgage always a mortgage," but "Once a mortgage and a separate personal agreement or obligation by the mortgagor, always a mortgage only, and no such binding agreement or obligation"; and that it may be contended hereafter that the rule in this form may be enforced even where the security and the subject of the security can be completely redeemed by the simple repayment of principal and interest. I confess I think such a proposition is unreasonable and unwarranted, for it operates so as to prevent the owner of a property from using its value to the full extent in obtaining a loan on it, and enables him to disregard a clear obligation undertaken for onerous causes. If the right of redemption of the mortgage is quite unfettered, the authorities cited do not, I think, apply; and that is the case here.

In the case of Noakes v. Rice I simply concurred in the judgment given. The Lord Chancellor had entirely expressed the view of the law which I strongly hold in his judgment which he gave, to the effect that Lord Lindley had "given a most authoritative exposition of the true effect of the rule in the case of Santley v. Wilde." Lord Lindley had there said, in words which the Lord Chancellor quoted and in which I entirely agree: "Any provision inserted to prevent redemption on payment or performance of the debt or obligation for which the security was given is what is meant by a clog or fetter on the equity of redemption, and is therefore void. It follows from this that once a mortgage always a mortgage, but I do not understand that this principle involves the further proposition that the amount or nature of the further debt or obligation, the payment or performance of which is to be secured, is a clog or fetter within the rule." The Lord Chancellor carefully added: "It is and must be in each case a question of the particular thing which is advanced as a clog or fetter, and in some cases it may be seen to come very near the line. Whatever rule is laid down one can reduce it to something like an absurdity by taking an extreme case."

The only case to which I think it necessary to refer is that of Browne v. Ryan, one of that very class which, as the Lord Chancellor says, "may be said to come very near the line." In that case the mortgagee sought damages for the breach of a contract depriving the mortgagor of his property even after its redemption by him, thus leaving a fetter on the subject of the security, as Lord Lindley observes in his judgment in this case; and so it may be taken simply as an illustration of the rule, "once a mortgage always a mortgage," and is in this view clearly to be distinguished from the present case, for in this case there is no fetter of any kind on the power of redemption.

Lord DAVEY.—In advising this House in the case of Noakes v. Rice, I endeavoured to express my views as to the meaning and effect of the equitable rules affecting the redemption of mortgage securities. I see no reason to dissent from anything which I then said, and I need not repeat it. I might, however, have added that the expression "clogging" or "fettering" the equity of redemption is not the happiest mode of expressing the object to which the third rule referred to by me is directed. The principle, as it appears to me, is that on payment of the principal, interest, and costs, together with any bonus or anything in the nature of a bonus which has been properly stipulated for, and has become payable, the mortgage contract comes to an end, and the mortgagee is entitled to get his property back, unaltered in character, condition, and incidents, and is henceforth relieved from the burden imposed upon him by the contract. If this be the true principle (as I think it is), the decision of the present case presents no difficulty. There can be no doubt that the obligation assumed by the first appellant in clause 4 of the agreement of the 16th of May, 1892, is part of the mortgage contract, and the corresponding advantage to the respondent was derived therefrom exclusively. The form of the agreement shows this. It begins with the words, "In consideration of two thousand and fifty pounds this day advanced by you to me." Then follow six numbered paragraphs containing the terms agreed to by the mortgagee, including the fourth clause, which commences with the words "I further agree," and so forth. If, therefore, any breach of the agreement in clause 4 had taken place during the currency of the mortgage, or any moneys had become exigible under it, I make no doubt that the appellant William Bradley would have been liable. But the mortgage has now been paid off, and everything which became due during the currency of it has been paid. The breach which is complained of has taken place since redemption, and I am really at a loss to understand how, consistently with the equitable doctrine, a mortgagee can insist on retaining the benefit of a covenant in the mortgage contract materially affecting the enjoyment of the mortgaged property after all principal, interest, and costs, and everything which has become payable before redemption, has been paid. I agree with Lord Macnaghten in thinking that the case of Santley v. Wilde was wrongly decided. I thought so when Noakes v. Rice was under consideration in this House, and a further examination of the report of the case has confirmed me in my opinion. Two of the learned judges who decided that case in the Court of Appeal thought that it was covered by the case of Biggs v. Hoddinott. I cannot agree. It is, to my mind, plainly distinguishable. All that I understand to have been decided in Biggs v. Hoddinott is, first, that the stipulations for the continuance of a loan for five years was valid; and secondly, that a covenant to take beer from the mortgagee limited to the continuance of the security did not clog the equity of redemption, and was enforceable by injunction. Lord Lindley, however, based his decision in Santley v. Wilde on a broader ground; but he seems to me to have divided the transaction into two parts—namely, a loan of £2,000 and a sale of two-thirds of the profits of the theatre. That seems to me a fallacious and wrong way of looking at the transaction, which was a mortgage transaction, and the only consideration for the grant of two-thirds of the profits was the loan of the money. It appears to me that the claim to retain the security as a security for the share of profits was in fact imposing a fetter on the redemption on payment of principal, interest, and costs. And I understand this to be the view taken by Lord Macnaghten.

It is, in my opinion, idle to say that the mortgagor in this case has got his property back unfettered, or that he has the unrestricted enjoyment of it, if the agreements contained in the fourth clause of the contract of the 10th of May, 1892, are held to constitute a continuing obligation. It is said that the performance of these agreements is not secured on the shares. But that is not necessary. The agreements which were held objectionable, both in Browne v. Ryan and Noakes v. Rice, did not constitute charges on the mortgaged premises, but they fettered the mortgagor in the one case in the free disposition, and in the other the free enjoyment, of his property. In the present case the agreement is that the appellant W. M. Bradley will "as a shareholder" use his best endeavours to secure the sale of the company's teas to the respondent or his firm, and in the event of the teas being sold through another broker will pay to the respondent the amount of the commission which he or his firm might have earned. In other words, he agrees to use the voting power attached to his shares in a particular way for the respondent's benefit. Now, what is a share? It is a bundle of rights, of which the right of voting at meetings of the company is not the least important. Can it be said that the mortgagee does not retain a hold upon the shares which form the mortgaged property, or that the mortgagor has had full redemption of it when the latter is not free to exercise a material right in such manner as he may think most conducive to his own interests? He may think it advantageous or otherwise to deal with his shares without losing the influence in the company's counsels which might enable him to secure the performance of the first part of the agreement, or running a serious risk of liability under the second part. He may think it advantageous to the company to employ another broker, or that the change would produce a better return on his shares; but if he gives effect to his opinion he incurs what is in effect a heavy penalty.

I can see no difference in principle between this case and the case of Browne v. Ryan, which has already been approved in this House. The respondent can no more claim to be continuously employed as broker for the sale of the teas of the appellant's company, or to be compensated for the loss of his commission if not so employed, than the land agent in Browne v. Ryan, who claimed to be employed in the sale of the farmer's estate, or to be compensated for the loss of his commission. I am therefore of opinion that, even if the fourth clause of the contract bears the construction which has been put upon it by the courts below, the agreements contained in it are such as cannot, in the circumstances, be enforced by the courts of this country. But I doubt whether we ought to put that construction on the clause in question. Primâ facie, a clause in a mortgage contract is limited to the duration of the mortgage relation between the contracting parties. In this clause we have the words "always hereafter" but I observe that in two other clauses (the third and the tenth) a similar phrase, "at any time hereafter," is used and is limited by the context to the duration of the mortgage. I am disposed to say that the words "always hereafter," having regard to the nature and purport of the agreement, in like manner mean at any time hereafter during the currency of the loan. But in the view which I take of the case it is not necessary for me to express a decided opinion on the question.

With regard to the appellant James Bradley's agreement, I think it was part of the same transaction and ancillary to the principal agreement and by way of further security and increased remuneration to him for the use of his money; and I am of opinion that it must be construed in the same way, and stand or fall with the principal agreement.

I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and instead thereof the action should be dismissed with costs, and the respondent should pay the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House.

Lord ROBERTSON.—In considering this case, I have found myself greatly aided by first forming a clear conception of what is the respondent's theory of Mr. William Bradley's rights and duties as a shareholder of this company. Before this loan and agreement, Mr. William Bradley was entitled, like everyone else, to use his position as a shareholder solely for his own benefit. In particular, he could vote for such tea brokers as he thought would bring in good profits, and therefore good dividends on his 1 541 shares. Now, according to the respondent, he is not entitled to do this. On the contrary, he is bound to vote in the important matter of choosing a tea broker, not in the interests of himself, the shareholder, but in the interests of the respondent, the candidate for the tea brokership. It is true he has the option (somewhat derisory, as I cannot but think) of voting freely and paying two tea brokers; for, if the respondent is not appointed, then Mr. William Bradley has got to make good to the respondent the commission lost by that gentleman's non-employment, as well as to contribute to pay the broker who is appointed. This, according to the respondent, is to be the tenure of his share by Mr. William Bradley for all time, or at least so long as the respondent or his firm carry on business. Now, if it be asked why is Mr. William Bradley thus limited in his enjoyment of his shares and made bound to use them for the respondent's benefit? the answer must be, Because, once upon a time, the respondent lent Mr. Bradley money, long since repaid, and gave him his shares in security, long since re-transferred. This is not merely historically the fact, but the mortgage itself sets out that this limitation of Mr. Bradley's right to deal with those shares as his own is agreed to in consideration of the advance.

Accordingly, on this question of fact it seems to me perfectly plain that, if the respondent is right in his law, one result of the agreement was that, in consideration of the advance, Mr. William Bradley had the respondent permanently quartered upon him, and that as regards that part of his estate—namely, the 1,541 shares—Mr. Bradley was bound to use it, in one important relation, no longer for his own interest, but for the respondent's, and his own so far as his own only did not conflict with the respondent's.

Now, when I turn to the law of the case, I speak with much more diffidence; for the system of jurisprudence in which I was trained does not in the matter of mortgages impose any restraint on free contracts. But I have made it my duty to study and understand the law now in question. I do not hold myself entitled to question or detract from it; and I am unable to resist the conclusion that the appellants are entitled to prevail. I entirely agree in the judgment of Lord Davey.

Lord LINDLEY.—Mr. Carritt (the respondent in this case) brought an action against several persons, including the two appellants, for the recovery of damages for breaches by them of certain agreements entered into by them with him. The agreements sued upon were contained in three letters—namely, first, a letter dated the 14th of August, 1889, signed by William Bradley on behalf of himself and all the other defendants; secondly, a letter dated the 16th of May, 1892, signed by William Bradley alone; and thirdly, a letter of the same date, signed by James Bradley alone. The plaintiff discontinued his action against the defendants other than the two Bradleys, and the action against them was tried before Bigham, J., and a special jury. The plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for £750 against the two Bradleys for their breaches of their agreements of the 16th of May, 1892. From this verdict and judgment they appealed to the Court of Appeal, and asked that the verdict and judgment against them might be set aside, and that judgment might be entered for them with costs, or that a new trial might be directed. This appeal was dismissed with costs. The two Bradleys now appeal to your lordships and ask that judgment may be entered for them.

No question now arises as to the first agreement of 1889, and except as part of the history of the two letters of the 16th of May, 1892, the letter of 1889 is of no importance. The two Bradleys put in a joint amended defence, and alleged that if the letters of the 16th of May, 1892, were to be construed as the plaintiff contended, then those letters did not express the real agreement between the parties, and ought to be rectified; and in the court below evidence was gone into to establish this defence. The attempt to do so failed, and it was not seriously renewed either in the Court of Appeal or before your lordships, and it is unnecessary to refer further to this controversy.

The questions raised by this appeal are: First, the true construction of the two letters of the 16th of May, 1892; secondly, their validity, having regard to equitable doctrines relating to mortgage transactions; and, thirdly, the form of the judgment as entered against the two appellants.

The two letters in question are set out in the record, and I will not detain your lordships by reading them at length. The first of them—namely, that signed by William Bradley—is the most important, and the only one which need be considered in discussing the meaning and validity of both. In order to understand this letter the position of the writer and of Mr. Carritt, to whom it was written, should be known. The tea company mentioned in the letter had been formed in 1889 by the Bradleys, and Mr. Carritt had assisted them in the issue of debentures on the formation of the company. Mr. Carritt was a member of a firm of tea brokers, carrying on business under the name of Lloyd, Mathesn, & Carritt. In 1889 that firm had been appointed the tea brokers of the tea company, and the firm had been its tea brokers ever since. There had been some controversy, however, about the permanency of their appointment, and different views on this subject had been expressed. The two Bradleys were large shareholders in this tea company, and were also directors of it. William Bradley wanted to borrow £2 250, and Mr. Carritt lent it him on the terms mentioned in the letter. It is quite immaterial to consider the sources from which Mr. Carritt obtained the money. As between him and William Bradley, Mr. Carritt was the lender, and the advance of the money is not disputed.

The letter states that in consideration of the advance William Bradley agrees to repay it with interest at 7 per cent., and as security he hands over—first, his promissory note for that amount and interest; and secondly, a transfer of 1,541 fully paid up shares in the tea company, and a certificate for those shares in Bradley's name. Then comes a power of sale in default of payment (clause 3), and this is followed lower down by a special power to sell forty-one of the shares even before any default is made (clause 5). So far there is nothing more than a loan; a promise to pay; a promissory note; and an agreement for a mortgage of a certain number of shares with the powers of sale mentioned. There is another clause (6) by which Bradley agrees to execute any further document which Mr. Carritt shall require for perfecting or giving effect to the security intended to be thereby made. In addition, however, to this mortgage transaction there is another clause (4), which runs thus: "I further agree, as a shareholder in the Sephinjuri Bheel Tea Co. and in every other capacity to use my best endeavours to secure that you or any firm of brokers of which you for the time being shall be a partner (as you shall elect) shall always hereafter have the sale of all the company's teas as broker. And in the event of any of the company's teas then being sold otherwise than through you or your firm, I personally engage and agree to pay to you or your firm the amount of the commission which you or your firm would have earned if the teas had been sold through you or your firm. This engagement on my part is in addition to and without prejudice to any previous engagements to you, and in particular to the contract of the 14th of August, 1889, by which I agreed on behalf of the proprietors to give you the sale of all the company's teas." The plaintiff's action, so far as Mr. William Bradley is concerned, is for a breach of this agreement. The loan was called in and was paid off, and the shares which had been transferred and registered in the name of Mr. Carritt or his nominee were duly re-transferred to and registered in the name of William Bradley. But in August, 1899, the company changed their tea brokers and ceased to employ Mr. Carritt or his firm, and this action was then brought.

The first question which arises is the true construction of this clause 4. The defendants contend that when the loan was paid off this clause ceased to be operative; that it was part of the security for the loan, and that the words "always hereafter" ought to be construed as the words "at any time hereafter" in clauses 3 and 5 giving the powers of sale must be construed. This contention appears to me quite untenable. It is obvious that the powers of sale are conferred in order to enable the mortgagee to get back his money and for no other purpose, and the words "at any time hereafter" in those powers have no sensible meaning and no legal operation after the loan is paid. This reasoning is wholly inapplicable to clause 4. Again, to say that clause 4 is part of the security appears to me quite incorrect. It is true that the loan of the money is the consideration for the whole agreement, including clause 4; but the security for the loan is the promise to repay it, the promissory note and the shares with the powers to sell them. Clause 4 is in no sense part of the security for the money, but it is an additional advantage stipulated for by the mortgagee. Clause 4 means what it says. It gives Mr. Carritt the option of himself, or any firm of tea brokers of which he is a member, becoming an applicant for the appointment of tea broker to the company, and binds Mr. William Bradley to use his best endeavours to secure that appointment; and if any other broker should be employed by the company to sell the company's teas, then Bradley undertakes to pay to Carritt, or his firm, as the case may be, the commission lost by their non-employment. The only limit to the duration of this agreement is that set by the possibility of carrying it out. It would necessarily cease if Mr. Carritt gave up the business of tea broker, or if the company gave up selling tea; but I can discover no other event on which it would come to an end. I can discover no legitimate ground for implying that it was to last only for a reasonable time, nor can I find any measure for such a period. To use Bigham, J.'s, language, the words "always hereafter" in this clause mean, so long as I am in a position to sell the teas and the teas are there for me to sell. It is hardly necessary to add that Mr. James Bradley's letter bears the same meaning. This letter is to the same effect as clause 4, but Mr. James Bradley did not make himself liable for the loan, although the loan was the consideration for the promise he made.

I pass now to the second question—namely, the validity of the contracts sued upon, and it will be convenient to take Mr. James Bradley's letter first. If he had been sued separately for a breach of his contract, I cannot conceive what defence he would have had to the action. Legal defence is out of the question; and there being no fraud, undue influence, oppression, or extortion, I can discover no ground whatever for the interference of a court of equity with the legal rights of the plaintiff. Mr. James Bradley contracted as a principal; he was not a mortgagee; he was not a surety, or in any way responsible for the mortgage debt; he had no interest in the shares mortgaged; he would not be a necessary or proper party to any suit in equity by or against Mr. William Bradley for the redemption or foreclosure of his mortgage. I cannot see that Mr. James Bradley's position is altered by the fact that he has been made a co-defendant with Mr. William Bradley in the present action, or by the fact that the two defendants have joined in defending it. This procedure was, I suppose, adopted to save expense, but it cannot, in my judgment, affect the merits of the case in any way whatever. As regards Mr. James Bradley, I am unable to discover any defence or semblance of defence to the plaintiff's action.

Mr. William Bradley's position is no doubt different, for he was a mortgagee, and he is sued upon an agreement imposing upon him an obligation beyond that of repaying the money lent, with interest and costs, and which agreement was entered into in consideration of the loan for which he mortgaged his shares.

Before considering the validity or invalidity of this additional agreement it is essential to bear in mind that Mr. William Bradley raised no defence to the action on the ground of fraud, undue influence, extortion, or oppression. No issue was raised or left to the jury on which a verdict could have been given for the defendant on any of these grounds. The only defence set up was mistake, and this failed. The legal point that the agreement was invalid on equitable doctrines applicable to the admitted or established facts is of course still open to argument. But no other defence can, I apprehend, be now properly listened to. I allude more particularly to such a possible ground of defence as oppression or unfairness in the bargain. Bigham, J., and the Court of Appeal both alluded to this suggested defence, and said that, in their opinion, the agreement was not oppressive or unreasonable; and I agree with them.

If the agreement contained in clause 4 is to be held invalid, it must be upon some equitable principle applicable to the terms of the bargain itself, and to the facts not now in controversy. The equitable grounds relied on are, as I understand them, two in number—namely, first, that clause 4 is a clog on the redemption, and infringes the well-settled equitable principle, Once a mortgage always a mortgage; secondly, that it is part of the mortgage transaction, and must, as a matter of law, cease with it, in conformity with the rule, Once a mortgage always a mortgage, and nothing but a mortgage.

As to the first ground, clause 4 gives the mortgagee of the shares no right or interest in them, legal or equitable. So long as he holds them as mortgagee he has the ordinary rights of a mortgagee, with the rights of selling them conferred by the other clauses of the agreement; but when he is paid off his principal, interest, and costs, he is bound to re-transfer the shares to the mortgagor, and clause 4 contains nothing whatever which entitles or purports to entitle the mortgagee to retain the shares or to control the use of them when returned to the mortgagor. Clause 4 in no way fetters the right to redeem nor obstructs the mortgagor in the practical exercise of that right, or of the use or enjoyment of his shares when he gets them back. He can then do what he likes with them free from all control by the mortgagee. How it can be said that clause 4 clogs the equity of redemption or infringes the rule, Once a mortgage always a mortgage, passes my comprehension. It is admitted that after redemption the mortgagor can sell the shares; but it is said that so long as he holds them he is bound to use whatever influence they give him in favour of the mortgagee so as to enable him to retain his position of broker to the tea company. This observation, so far as it is true, applies to whatever shares Mr. William Bradley might happen to hold when it became necessary to use his influence in Mr. Carritt's favour. But clause 4 gives Mr. Carritt no legal or equitable right to have shares, still less any particular shares held by Mr. Bradley used in any particular way. By the first part of clause 4 Mr. Bradley has bound himself to use his best endeavours to secure the tea brokerage for Mr. Carritt; this might or might not involve voting for him. The votes conferred by the shares might be too few to be of any use, and other endeavours than voting in respect of them might be more likely to prevail. But to say that the equitable principle under discussion is infringed, and that clause 4 is invalid simply because it might be necessary for Mr. Bradley to use the influence which the mortgaged shares, if retained, would confer in order to perform his engagement to Mr. Carritt, seems to me to stretch the doctrine under consideration to an extent not warranted by principle or authority.

The second part of clause 4 binds Mr. Bradley to pay commission if Mr. Carritt loses the tea brokerage to the company, even although Mr. Bradley may have used his best endeavours to prevent such loss. The second part of clause 4 increases the inducement to make such endeavours, but that is its only bearing on the present controversy; and it is plain from the summing up of Bigham J., that the action was for a breach of this part of clause 4 and that the damages were assessed for this breach. The second part of the clause does not depend upon the first part, and comes into operation whether the first has been broken or whether it has been duly performed.

But then reliance is placed upon authority, and especially on Salt v. Northampton, Noakes v. Rice, Browne v. Ryan, and the disapproval by some of your lordships of Santley v. Wilde. I will therefore shortly refer to these cases. Salt v. Northampton turned entirely on the question whether the policy then in question was mortgaged, and for what. As soon as that was settled, there was no difficulty in applying the doctrine, Once a mortgage always a mortgage. That case does not appear to assist your lordships to decide the present controversy one way or the other. In Noakes v. Rice, if the decision had been the other way, and the contract had been upheld, the public-house, which was free when mortgaged, would have been tied to the mortgagee when redeemed. In Browne v. Ryan the mortgagee, who was an auctioneer, had stipulated for the right to sell the mortgaged property within twelve months after redemption, and whether the mortgagor desired to sell or not. In Noakes v. Rice this House approved that decision, although I expressed my doubts about its correctness. It goes further than any other case that I know of. I have searched in vain for any similar case in which the Court of Chancery restrained a common law action. But treating Browne v. Ryan as having been properly decided, the difference between that case and this is apparent, for the mortgagee there sought damages for the breach of a contract depriving the mortgagor of his property, even after its redemption by him. In Santley v. Wilde the Court of Appeal held that upon the true construction of the contract the property mortgaged, which was a theatre held for a short term of years, was made a security—first, for money borrowed and interest; and secondly, for the performance of an agreement entitling the mortgagee to a share of profits earned by the mortgagor during the lease, even although the loan might have been repaid with interest. The Court of Appeal, over which I then presided, considered that the security for both of these was valid. In Noakes v. Rice two of your lordships thought this decision wrong, and so did the Court of Appeal in Ireland in Browne v. Ryan. The error in the decision in Santley v. Wilde, in the view of those who think it wrong, was that the property mortgaged was burdened with more than the loan made upon it, and that redemption was impossible. That is not so in the case now before your lordships, as I have endeavoured to show. Santley v. Wilde was a difficult case, and it may have been wrongly decided, although I do not think it was. Be this as it may, I do not understand that the legal principles laid down in it have been condemned by this House as unsound. I say this after carefully considering the observations made on that case by the noble lords who decided Noakes v. Rice.

It remains to consider the second ground—namely, that clause 4 is part of the mortgage transaction, and must cease with it, or, in other words, that it infringes the last part of the rule. Once a mortgage always a mortgage, and nothing but a mortgage. When the usury laws were in force, and every device for evading them had to be defeated, the above language was convenient and as free from objection as most concise statements are; for every stipulation in a mortgage in favour of a mortgagee, and conferring pecuniary benefits on him, in addition to repayment of his principal moneys and lawful interest and costs, was open to the objection that it was a cloak for usury. But now that the usury laws are abolished such language is much too wide. Biggs v. Hoddinott, which was approved by this House in Noakes v. Rice, shows it to be so.

Laying aside the usury laws, and all rules to prevent their evasion, and laying also aside all considerations of fraud, undue influence, oppression, and illegality on other grounds, I am not aware of any authority which invalidates a contract between a mortgagor and mortgagee, unless it affects or purports to affect the property mortgaged, or the right to redeem it. Any contract which does that has always been held invalid in equity, and must now be treated as invalid by all courts. The restoration of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor on performance of the obligation to secure which it was mortgaged, is the grand object which courts of equity have always steadily kept in view and insisted on, all agreements to the contrary notwithstanding. The wasting away of leasehold or other property does not affect the principle, but only modifies its application. I hope that nothing which ever has fallen from me, or which may fall from me now, will cast any doubt on this matter. But beyond that I am not prepared to go. I cannot bring myself to believe that it is part of the law of this country that mortgagors and mortgagees cannot make what bargains they like with each other so long as such bargains are not inconsistent with the right of the mortgagor to redeem the property mortgaged by discharging the debt or obligation to secure which the mortgage was effected. I have given my reasons already for holding that this principle is not infringed in this case.

Upon the merits therefore, my opinion is that Bigham, J., and the Court of Appeal were right in giving judgment for the plaintiff.

There remains, thirdly, the point of form. The judgment as drawn up is against the two defendants jointly; but they were sued on different contracts, and in strictness the judgment should have been drawn on accordingly—that is, there should have been two judgments for the same sum—one against each defendant, but so worded as to prevent the plaintiff from being paid his damages twice over; for it is plain that the jury did not intend to give the plaintiff two sums of £750. The form of the judgment was not alluded to before Bigham, J., nor before the Court of Appeal. If your lordships agree with me, it will not be necessary to disturb the form of the order, for, although technically irregular, it does no injustice to any of the parties. Neither is it necessary to notice the irregularity, as the judgment is to be reversed as to both defendants. But if your lordships had allowed the appeal as to William Bradley's mortgage, but had affirmed the judgment as to James Bradley, I submit to your lordships that the proper course would have been to reverse the judgment so far it affects William Bradley, and leave it standing as a separate judgment as against James Bradley.

In my opinion, however, the appeal should simply be dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) And Chan. Div. (Byrne, J.) — June 30; July 22.

In re ALLSOPP & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Capital—Reduction—Dissentient stockholders—Sanction of court—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 11—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26).

A scheme for reduction of capital is not necessarily unfair or inequitable because it involves the alteration of rights of voting and priority, as between the different classes of stockholders.

Judgment of Byrne, J., reversed.

This was a petition to confirm a reduction of capital that had been duly resolved on by all the different classes of stockholders of Samuel Allsopp & Sons (Limited).

The capital of the company at the time of the petition amounted to £3,300,000, divided into £1,100,000 6 per cent. cumulative preference stock with preference also as to capital but with no voting power; £1,100,000 7 per cent. non-cumulative preferred ordinary stock, having preference over the deferred ordinary stock as to capital, but having no voting power; £1,100,000 deferred ordinary stock, with all the voting power.

Resolutions had been duly passed by all the different classes of stockholders, by which it was proposed to reduce the capital to the sum of £1,870,000, divided into £1,100,000 6 per cent cumulative preference stock, £550,000 preferred ordinary stock, and £220,000 deferred ordinary stock, by writing off capital lost or unrepresented by available assets to the extent of 10s. in the £ of the preferred ordinary stock, and 16s. in the £ of deferred ordinary stock.

It was also proposed (1) that in the event of the reduction taking place the 6 per cent. preference stockholders should give up entirely £99,900 part of £198,000 this being three years' arrears of cumulative interest due to them on the 30th of June, 1903, and should accept it in lieu of payment of the remaining £99 000 income funded certificates bearing interest at 4 per cent.

(2) that the remainder of the preferred and deferred ordinary stocks should be consolidated, thus forming £77,000 new ordinary stock;

(3) that the 6 per cent. preference stockholders should have seven votes for every £100 stock, and that the new ordinary stockholders should have ten votes for every £100 stock, thus giving to the preference stockholders one half of the voting power of the company and the remaining half to the new ordinary stockholders.

The scheme was opposed by Dr. Alexander, who was one of the preferred ordinary stockholders, and there were also other dissentient preference ordinary stockholders who did not appear.

Levett, K.C., A. R. Kirby, and W. W. Renshaw supported the petition.—There has been loss of capital to the amount it is proposed to write off, the scheme is not unfair or unreasonable, and has been passed by the majority of shareholders.

Bassett Hopkins, for Dr. Alexander.—The loss has not been proved. The scheme is, ultra vires, unnecessary, also unfair and inequitable.

June 30.—BYRNE, J.—I am satisfied on the evidence that there has been the loss of capital sought to be established, taking into consideration the loss fairly to be attributed to diminished value of goodwill as being at least £100,000. It is true that I have not accepted one item, accepted by the parties as lost to the amount of something over £90,000, which was brought in as an item of lost capital, but I have accepted the evidence of diminution of goodwill to the extent of £100,000 not before brought into the account as having been proved. It now becomes my duty to say whether or not, looking at the whole scheme proposed, and bearing in mind that the necessary majorities in each class of stockholders have been obtained, the scheme is fair and reasonable in face of the opposition put forward on behalf of the preferred ordinary stockholders. In regard to this matter I think I ought to look at it fairly all round, to remember that it is not necessary to preserve every item of extreme right put forward by individuals, and to look at the matter as a commercial and business transaction, while at the same time regarding with jealousy interference as between classes and as between bodies of individuals having respectable, tangible interests with their legal status and position. I think the right way to consider this matter is, first, to see what are the rights and prospects of the various classes of existing stockholders while the company is a going concern and in the event of a winding up; and, secondly, to compare the position of the preferred ordinary stockholders, in the event of the proposed scheme being carried out, with that which they now hold, because apparently none of the preference stockholders or deferred ordinary stockholders oppose. [The learned judge then reviewed in detail the positions of the different classes of stockholders (1) in the present circumstances of the company, (2) in the case of a winding up, and (3) if the proposed scheme were carried out saying as regards the preferred ordinary stockholders.] Having regard to the loss of capital, they have to face this—that at all events for a series of years they cannot expect to receive, while the company is a going concern, any substantial payment (in fact for some years any payment at all) in respect of their holdings by way of profit. On the other hand, should the company be wound up, they would get back intact one half of their capital, that is to say, they would get back £770,000, subject to some considerable allowance which probably has to be made in case of a forced realization; but whatever it was, they would get all of what was left after satisfying the capital of the 6 per cent. preference stock. Now, what is their position after this comes into operation? While the company is a going concern they will have acquired a greater probability of a comparatively early payment on account of dividend, but they are giving up in respect of that dividend while the company is a going concern two-sevenths of what they would be otherwise entitled to, that is to say, they are giving up to the holders of the deferred ordinary stock £220,000 worth of stock which, if there were dividends earned in the particular year to answer it, would all go to them. But they are giving up a great deal more than that in the event of a winding up, because they are giving up their right to share in the division of the assets in a winding up in the same proportion, that is to say, they give up two-sevenths of what would otherwise be coming to them. And the learned judge continued: You cannot treat it on such broad lines as to say that unless the court saw something which looked like a downright robbery it was not to interfere. The thing is to consider fairly: Is it just and equitable to every class of shareholder? Looking at this matter with a benevolent leaning to assist the general views of the company as expressed in their resolutions, I still cannot help coming to the conclusion that this scheme is not fair and equitable so far as regards the interests of the preferred ordinary stockholders, and, therefore, it not being before me now as to putting any terms or suggesting any modifications, although I have accepted the evidence as to the capital having been lost, I do not think that I ought to confirm a reduction of capital having the results which I have pointed out.

The company appealed.

By the leave of the Court of Appeal the appeal was treated as an interlocutory appeal, and entered in the interlocutory list.

Haldane, K.C., Levett, K.C., A. R. Kirby, and W. W. Renshaw, for the appellant.

Bassett Hopkins, for the respondent.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in giving judgment, said that nobody could doubt that there had been a loss of capital to the extent alleged and that a reduction of capital was desirable, and the question for the court to decide was whether the proposed scheme was unfair or inequitable.

The persons at the present time who had the largest interest in the welfare of the company were undoubtedly the 6 per cent. preference stockholders; therefore it was only fair that they should have a voice in the management of the company, which under the proposed scheme they would get by obtaining a voting power equal to that of the remainder of the stockholders. As regards the deferred ordinary stockholders the circumstances of the case rendered it inadvisable to wipe them out entirely, besides which they at the present time had absolute control over the affairs of the company, therefore it was necessary to adopt a scheme to which they could be persuaded to consent even though it took away some of the privileges of the preferred ordinary stockholders. But, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and looking at the matter from a business point of view, and having, regard also to the large majorities by which the scheme was passed at the various meetings, including those of the preferred ordinary stockholders themselves at their own separate meetings, he came to the conclusion that the scheme would not work unfairly or inequitable on anybody.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774, considered.

Appeal from a decision of Hall, V.C., of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

The facts were as follows:

By a deed of 1868 Roger Hesketh Formby, the owner of certain land at Formby, in the county of Lancaster, conveyed that land to the Mutual Land Co., their successors and assigns, in fee simple. The deed contained a covenant, which ran as follows: "And the said company do hereby for themselves, their successors and assigns, covenant with the said Roger Hesketh Formby, his heirs, executors, and administrators, that . . . they shall not nor will erect, build, or make on the land coloured pink . . . any beerhouse or shop or any hotel of less annual value than £50."

The deed comprised the whole of the land belonging to R. H. Formby in the neighbourhood.

The deed was not in fact executed by the company, but by virtue of the deed they entered into possession of the said land.

R. H. Formby died in 1884.

In 1902 the defendant, who had purchased the land coloured pink from the company with notice of the restrictive covenant, threatened to build two shops on the land. They were not beershops or beerhouses, but shops wholly unconnected with beer.

The plaintiff, who was the sole beneficiary under the will of R. H. Formby, brought an action in her individual capacity and also as administratrix with the will annexed of R. H. Formby, to restrain the defendant from erecting any shop on the land.

Hall, V.C., held (1) that the erection of a shop not a beershop was not a breach of the covenant; (2) that the plaintiff could not maintain the action in any case, breach or no breach.

The plaintiff appealed.

Neville, K.C., and F. M. Preston, for the appellant.—It not being contrary to public policy, it would be unjust to allow a purchaser of land with knowledge of restrictive covenants to back out of them. When a man has been paid for not doing certain acts, it is only fair that he should refrain from doing those acts. The legal personal representative of the covenantee stands in the same position as the covenantee. He is entitled to sue when the act has taken place after the death of the covenantee, if damage is shown.

They cited the following cases: Renals v. Cowlishaw, 26 W. R. 754, 9 Ch. D. 125; Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403; Western v. MacDermott, 15 W. R. 265, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 72; Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 633, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 463; Stokes v. Russell, 3 T. R. 678; Doherty v. Allman, 26 W. R. 513, 3 App. Cas. 709; and Lloyd v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 13 W. R. 698, 2 De G. J. & S. 568.

Astbury, K.C., and W. Dixon MacConkey, for the respondent.—This is a restrictive covenant in gross, and the legal personal representative of a covenantee, who parted with all his land at the time the covenant was made, cannot bring such an action as this.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The first question which has to be decided is whether the building of such a shop would be a breach of the covenant. That depends upon the construction of the covenant. The covenant is ambiguous, but I think one ought to read "shop" as meaning beershop. This view really puts an end to the plaintiff's case, but as another defence was raised and is discussed by the learned Vice-Chancellor, I think it right to deal with that point also. The learned Vice-Chancellor expressed his opinion that even if the plaintiff's construction of the covenant was right and there had been a breach of the covenant, nevertheless the plaintiff was not entitled to sue either as the personal representative of Roger Formby or as residuary devisee under the will of Roger Formby. I agree with the conclusions of the Vice-Chancellor as to there being nothing in the point made by the defendant on the non-execution by the company other than this, that there is no legal covenant. I have no doubt but that the Mutual Land Co. took the estates conveyed subject to the condition contained in the covenant, and I have no doubt but that Formby, during his life, could have enforced that condition and I am inclined to think even by an action for damages. I wish before dealing with the question of the plaintiff's right to sue to point out that that which Roger Formby conveyed was his whole estate, and that he had no contiguous estate which could be benefited by the covenant in question. I wish further to point out that there is in the deed no re-entry clause under which the vendor could go in as of his old estate or indeed as of any estate. In my judgment this covenant is a personal covenant, but I do not think that, having regard to the opinions of the judges delivered in the House of Lords in Beckham v. Drake, 2 H. L. Cas. 579, the right of action which would have been vested in Roger Formby on a breach in his lifetime is of such a character that a breach after his death would not give a right of action to his personal representative against the covenantors, the Mutual Land Co. The maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona has no application to any breaches of contract except those which constitute a mere personal wrong, and, with the exception of actions for breaches which constitute a mere personal wrong, all rights of action for breaches of contract pass to the executors. In an action for breach of covenant or condition proof of damage is not essential, and, in my judgment, there has been, if the plaintiff's construction of the covenant is right, a plain breach in this case, which breach is not a mere personal wrong. But this still leaves the difficulty that the defendant is not a party to the deed, and that there is plainly no covenant running with land on which the defendant could be sued at law. It becomes necessary, therefore, to see if an action for an injunction can be brought upon the principle established by Lord Cottenham's judgment in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774. Now, in the marginal note in that case it is said: "A covenant between vendor and purchaser, on the sale of land, that the purchaser and his assigns shall use or abstain from using the land in a particular way, will be enforced in equity against all subsequent purchasers with notice, independently of the question whether it be one which runs with the land so as to be binding upon subsequent purchasers at law." But when the Lord Chancellor begins his judgment he says: "That this court has jurisdiction to enforce a contract between the owner of land and his neighbour purchasing a part of it that the latter shall either use or abstain from using the land purchased in a particular way is what I never knew disputed." These words do not cover the present case, because the land company did not purchase a part of the vendor's land but the whole of it. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider whether the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay applies to a case when the vendor sells his whole estate. I have not been able to find any case in which, after the sale of the whole of an estate in land, the benefit of a restrictive covenant has been enforced by injunction against an assignee of the purchaser at the instance of a plaintiff having no land retained by the vendor, although there are cases in which restrictive covenants seem to have been enforced at the instance of plaintiffs other than the vendor for the benefit of whose land it appears, from the terms of the covenant or can be inferred from surrounding circumstances, the covenant was intended to operate. In all other cases the restrictive covenant would seem to be a mere personal covenant collateral to the conveyance.

This is a covenant which cannot run with the land either at law or in equity, and therefore the burden of the covenant cannot be enforced against an assignee of the purchaser. But it is said that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay is independent of the question whether there is in law or in equity a covenant running with the land, and that doctrine is based upon obligations resting on the conscience of persons taking an estate with notice of a restrictive covenant binding it. The answer, I think, is to be found in a passage in the judgment of Collins, L.J., in Rogers v. Hosegood, 48 W. R. 659, [1900] 2 Ch. 388. He says: "These authorities establish the proposition that when the benefit has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land it passes by assignment of that land, and may be said to run with it in contemplation as well of equity as of law without proof of special bargain or representation on the assignment. In such a case it runs, not because the conscience of either party is affected, but because the purchaser has bought something which inhered in or was annexed to the land bought. This is the reason why, in dealing with the burden, the purchaser's conscience is not affected by notice of covenants which were part of the original bargain, but were merely personal and collateral, while it is affected by notice of those which touch and concern the land. The covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land before the question of the purchaser's conscience and the equity affecting it can come into discussion." It seems to me that in the passage I have just cited the Master of the Rolls assumes that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay will not apply to a contract which is merely personal and collateral. In my judgment, the covenant in the present case is merely personal and collateral. It has not been entered into for the benefit of any land of the vendor or of any land designated in the conveyance. It is a covenant which, in my judgment, would not pass to the heir of the vendor, notwithstanding the words of the covenant are "covenant with the said Roger Hesketh Formby, his heirs, executors, and administrators." There is no land designated to which the word "heirs" can be applied. Roger Formby could have sued the purchasers for breaches in his lifetime, and I think that his executrix could have sued the purchasers for breaches after the death of Roger Formby, but I do not think that the executrix can sue the assignee of the purchasers. There is no contractual privity and no relation of "dominancy" and "serviency" of lands which will enable an action to be brought against a person not a party to the original contract. Nor do I think that the benefit of this covenant could be dealt with by a devise.

There is a passage in the judgment of Sir George Jessel in London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562, which runs as follows: "The doctrine in Tulk v. Moxhay, rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine in Spencer's case to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements, such, for instance, as a right to the access of light which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light." Again he says, "This is an equitable doctrine establishing an exception to the rules of common law, which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land, and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or on analogy to an easement." I think that in both these paragraphs Sir George Jessel, whether describing the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay as an extension of Spencer's case, 1 Smith L. C. 55, or of the equitable doctrine of negative easements, regards it as something arising from the relation of two estates one to the other.

I have only to add that I do not think that either the passage in the judgment of Knight-Bruce, L.J., in De Mattos v. Gibson, 7 W. R. 152, 403, 514, 4 De G. & J. 276, nor the statement of the law by Lord Cairns in Doherty v. Allman in any way militates against the conclusion at which I have arrived, that when a negative or restrictive covenant is imposed upon user of land it will not be enforced against an owner not a party to the deed containing the covenant if such covenant is merely personal and collateral to a conveyance of land.

If it is said that the statement of Knight-Bruce, L.J., which runs thus: "Reason and justice seem to prescribe that, at least as a general rule, where a man, by gift or purchase, acquires property from another, with knowledge of a previous contract, lawfully and for valuable consideration made by him with a third person, to use and employ the property for a particular purpose in a specified manner, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract and inconsistently with it, use and employ the property in a manner not allowable to the giver and seller. This rule, applicable alike in general as I conceive to moveable and immoveable property, and recognized and adopted, as I apprehend, by the English law, may, like other general rules, be liable to exceptions arising from special circumstances; but I see at present no room for any exception in the instance before us," negatives the above conclusion because it shows that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay applies to personal as well as real property. I answer, first, that the basis of the statement by Knight-Bruce, L.J., is rather the principle of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604, than that of Tulk v. Moxhay, and, secondly, that it is plain that the Lord Justice would not have thought that an injunction ought to have been granted if the plaintiff had assigned the charter-party, nor unless the plaintiff had sustained material damage. And as to what Lord Cairns says in Doherty v. Allman it only shows that proof of damage is not necessary for the granting of an injunction in a case in which the parties to a contract for valuable consideration, with their eyes open, contract that a particular thing shall not be done. I think for the reasons which I have given the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was right on both points and I think this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree that we ought not in this case to differ from the view taken by the Vice-Chancellor as to the true construction of the covenant in question. I also agree in thinking that in this case, even if there had been a breach of the covenant, the executors of the covenantee are not entitled to an injunction. If restrictive covenants are entered into with a covenantee, and in respect of or concerning any ascertainable property belonging to the covenantee or in which he is interested, then the covenant must be regarded, so far as he is concerned, as a personal covenant—that is to say, as one obtained by him for some personal purpose or object. It appears to me that it is not legally permissible for him to assign the benefit of such a covenant to any person or persons he may choose, so as to place the assign or assigns in his position, with power again for them to assign, and so on indefinitely. Clearly at law such a right or power of assigning does not exist, and in equity up to the present time no such right has been recognized. To admit a right to obtain an injunction in such a case in any assign would be extend the principle recognized in Tulk v. Moxhay, far beyond what is, in my opinion, justifiable. And for the purposes of the present case the executors can only be regarded, and can only be entitled (if at all) to any relief, in the capacity of assigns of the covenant, for the alleged breach of the covenant relied on took place after the death of the covenantee. I think, therefore, that on this ground also the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—By a deed of the 27th of July, 1868, Roger Hesketh Formby, upon a sale by him of certain real estate, conveyed that estate to the purchaser subject to restrictive covenants expressed to be entered into by the purchaser with him, his heirs, executors, and administrators. At the date of this deed Roger Hesketh Formby was not entitled to any land, freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, other than that which was thereby conveyed. Consequently he was not at that date, nor (if it be material) did he subsequently become, entitled to any land for the protection or benefit of which the restrictive covenants were or could be intended. The plaintiff is his executrix and universal legatee.

In point of fact the deed of 1868 was not executed by the purchaser, and consequently there was no covenant as between vendor and purchaser which could be enforced at law; but with reference to the question whether the obligation intended to be imposed on the purchaser can be enforced in equity this is immaterial; and it seems to me best to consider what the rights of the plaintiff could have been if such a covenant had in fact existed.

She might have brought an action at law; but I have difficulty in seeing that she could have recovered more than nominal damages. However, if substantial damages could be recovered, it would seem to be the duty of the executrix to resort to that remedy, for thus only could the personal estate, which it is her duty to protect, be benefited. I think that in the absence of special circumstances not found in the present case damages would not only be an adequate but the most appropriate remedy.

This being so, I do not think that a court of equity ought to interfere in her favour by way of injunction. If it did, I do not see why the like relief should be denied to any duly constituted legal personal representative of Roger Hesketh Formby at any time, however remote, assuming always that matters remained as they were at the date of his death. This seems to me to amount to a reductio ad absurdum of the plaintiff's claim.

To avoid misconception I wish to add that different considerations would apply if the action had been brought by Roger Hesketh Formby in his lifetime.

The Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to entertain an application for a new trial of an interpleader issue tried in the Liverpool Court of Passage.

Application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an interpleader issue tried before the judge of the Liverpool Court of Passage with a jury.

The question to be determined in the issue was whether a bill of sale, under which the plaintiff claimed certain goods which had been taken in execution upon a judgment recovered by the defendant against one Joseph Taggart was valid or not.

By the bill of sale Joseph Taggart as mortgagor assigned to the plaintiff as mortgagee the chattels and things specifically described in the schedule thereto, and also all chattels and things which might at any time during the continuance of the security be substituted for them or any of them, to hold by way of security for repayment of an advance of £50. The bill of sale contained a covenant by the mortgagor that he would not during the continuance of the security, without the written consent of the mortgagee, assign or underlet the said chattels and things expressed to be thereby assigned, or any of them, or remove the same or any of them except for necessary repairs, and would replace such of them as should be worn out by other articles of value equal to the present value of the articles worn out, so as at all times to keep up the total value of the chattels and things comprised in the security to the present value.

The bill of sale was duly executed by the grantor, and attested by a witness, the witness's address and description being added after his name in accordance with the form contained in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. But the copy of the bill of sale filed on registration in pursuance of section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, omitted the signature of the grantor, and the signature, address, and description of the attesting witness. The affidavit filed with the copy of the bill of sale was in correct form, and stated, among the other requisite particulars, that the bill of sale was duly executed by the grantor, and that the execution thereof was witnessed by the attesting witness, and gave the name, address, and description of the attesting witness.

It was contended on the part of the defendant that the bill of sale was invalid—first, because no true copy of its attestation was filed on registration; secondly, because it purported to assign future property.

At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the learned judge held that the bill of sale was good.

The defendant appealed.

J. H. Pugh (J. W. Ross Brown with him), for the plaintiff, took a preliminary objection.—There is no appeal from a judgment of the Court of Passage in an interpleader issue. By section 68 of the Liverpool Court of Passage Procedure Act, 1853, the judgment of the court in any interpleader proceedings shall be final and conclusive. See also section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. Section 45 of the Liverpool Court of Passage Procedure Act, 1853, provides that by the leave of the judge "on the trial of any issue" an application to set aside the verdict or judgment may be made to one of the superior courts at Westminster. And section 10 of the Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893, provides that "an appeal shall be allowed upon the trial of any issue in the Court of Passage in every case where an appeal would be allowed on a trial at nisi prius and subject to the same rules, regulations, and provisions." But neither of the two last-mentioned sections apply to interpleader issues. Even if section 10 of the Act of 1893 applies to interpleader issues at all, the right of appeal is only given subject to the rules. And by ord. 57, r. 11, the judgment in an interpleader issue shall be final and conclusive unless by special leave of the judge or of the Court of Appeal. Here no such leave has been obtained.

F. A. Greer, for the defendant.—Section 10 of the Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893, clearly allows an appeal in the case of an interpleader issue. Robinson v. Tucker, 32 W. R. 697, 14 Q. B. D. 371, shows that neither section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, nor ord. 57, r. 11, prevents an application for a new trial of an interpleader issue.

THE COURT overruled the preliminary objection.

F. A. Greer, for the defendant.—This bill of sale is bad on two grounds. Firstly, section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, requires that, on registration of a bill of sale, a true copy of the bill of sale and of every attestation of the execution of the bill of sale, together with an affidavit of the execution and attestation, shall be filed with the registrar. Section 8 says that if any bill of sale is not so registered, it shall be void. In this case there is no copy of the attestation. From a reading of the copy of the bill which was filed it would appear that the bill was never executed at all and never attested at all. Such an omission cannot be cured by the affidavit that the bill was executed and attested: see Parsons v. Brand, 38 W. R. 388, 25 Q. B. D. 110. In Thomas v. Roberts, [1894] 1 Q. B. 657, 46 W. R. Dig. 19, a Divisional Court held that the omission of the date of the execution from the copy of the bill of sale might be cured by the affidavit. But the affidavit cannot be looked at to supply the name of the grantor and the name of the attesting witness. Secondly, the assignment of substituted chattels invalidates this bill of sale: Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R. 353, 13 App. Cas. 506. This is not such a mere proviso for substituting goods for goods that are worn out as was held in Seed v. Bradley, 42 W. R. 257, [1894] 1 Q. B. 319, to be a covenant for maintenance of the security. Here the mortgagor is not to assign without consent. That implies that he may assign with consent. Such a provision goes further than is necessary for the maintenance of the security.

J. H. Pugh and J. W. Ross Brown, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion both the objections which have been taken to this bill of sale fail. The first objection is that in the copy of the bill of sale which had to be filed on registration the places for the signature of the grantor and for the signature, address, and description of the attesting witness are left in blank. It is contended that this is a failure to comply with the requirements of the Act. Practically the same point was taken in Thomas v. Roberts, and was overruled. There the date of the bill of sale was omitted in the copy, though it appeared in the original bill of sale and also in the affidavit. In this case, as in that, the matters omitted in the copy are contained in the original bill of sale and in the affidavit. I can see no distinction with regard to this point between the date of a bill of sale and the name of the grantor or the attesting witness. In either case I think the omission can be supplied by reference to the affidavit.

The second objection is that the bill of sale embraces after-acquired property. In Seed v. Bradley the grantor of a bill of sale covenanted that, so long as any money should remain owing on the security of the bill of sale, he would not remove any of the chattels without the previous consent of the grantee, except for necessary repairs, and would replace any articles damaged or worn out with others of equal value to be included in the security. It was held that such a covenant might be inserted in the bill of sale as being for "the maintenance of the security," and therefore did not constitute a deviation from the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. That seems to me to cover this case. I think that what is contemplated in this bill of sale is merely the substitution of chattels for the maintenance of the security.

By his will, made in November, 1880, the testator, who died in 1881, gave an annuity of £400 to his widow as a first charge on his income and capital. He also gave an annuity of £150 to his son Henry and of £450 to Hannah Southgate for her life with remainder to her four children for their lives.

Power was given to the trustees, in case the income was insufficient, to raise the annuities by mortgage of the real estate.

All the annuities were paid in full up to October, 1886, partly out of money raised for the purpose by mortgage of the real estate.

Nothing was paid to the son and Mrs. Southgate after that date.

The widow died in January, 1903, her annuity having been paid in full up to that date, the deficiency being made up out of capital.

FARWELL, J.—This petition raises some very curious points. The testator made his will in November, 1880. His widow had what I may call a right of enjoyment in a certain house and the grounds around it, and she also had a life interest in the residuary real and personal estate subject to certain annuities. She had a paramount annuity of £400 a year. The fund now in court, and to which the petition relates, and of which it asks the distribution, represents the proceeds of sale of real estate in which the widow had a life interest, and on which the annuities were not charged until after her death, except subject to her prior interest. This fund is now to be distributed. The annuities in question are an annuity of £150 to the son Henry and of £450 to Hannah. These two were immediate annuities in possession, taking effect on the testator's death. After the death of Hannah the annuity of £450 given to her is divided amongst her children. The annuities to Hannah and Henry have not been paid in full after a certain date. Henry died on the 29th of August, 1891, and Hannah on the 21st of September, 1900.

On the 9th of August, 1883, an order was made directing a mortgage of the real estate under a power in the will, to which I will refer presently, for the purpose of raising moneys part of which were ordered to be applied in discharging the arrears of the annuities in possession.

The question now raised is whether the annuitants in possession ought to bring into hotchpot sums which they have received; or ought the division to be in accordance with the declaration in Potts v. Smith as distinguished from the subsequent directions, which purported to follow Todd v. Bielby.

I am of opinion that the real decision of James, V.C., is expressed in the declaration in Potts v. Smith. I cannot account for the subsequent additions and directions for bringing into hotchpot which appear in the order in that case, because they seem to me to be inconsistent with the words of the Vice-Chancellor.

The view taken by Lord Romilly which was followed by James, V.C., appears to me to be that you take the value of the annuity according to the events which have happened when the deficiency is ascertained at some period after the death of the testator; you reckon the values according to the events that have happened and you only value what is necessary to be valued—namely, the interest in futuro of such of the annuitants as may still be living. To bring into hotchpot all that has been paid in the past would be certainly a novel application of the principles of any of the cases that I have seen. If the testator's estate is proved to be insolvent at his death, so that no distribution can take effect at all, the court cuts the knot by treating everyone as having an interest which is immediately assessable in value and valuing a reversionary interest as much as an interest in possession because it is going to distribute the estate and in order to arrive at such distribution it must in some way or other arrive at the values of the reversionary interests as well as interests in possession. When you have immediate distribution you must have at once immediate assessment of values, or else you cannot distribute. But that is really a rule of the court, and to some extent defeats the object of the testator, who did not intend a person to whom he has given on the death of A. an annuity of £100 to receive £500 down on his own death, before the death of A.

The court has to do the best it can under circumstances which the testator did not contemplate. But where the estate is only ascertained to be of insufficient value at some period after the death of the testator, and the distribution has gone on for such a period, then in none of the cases to which I have been referred has there been any bringing into hotchpot of the sums which have been paid. In the case before me it appears to me that it would be unjust to do so. Bringing into hotchpot is only a rule of the court for the purpose of equally dividing the subject-matter of a gift amongst the objects to whom that gift is made. If that subject-matter is in fact given to A. for life and after his death B., the income which accrues to A. during his own life is something with which B. has nothing whatever to do. So far, therefore, as regards these annuitants in possession paid out of income in the past, it appears to me that on no principle of equity would it be right to make them bring that into hotchpot.

Then it is said this particular sum represents corpus and the annuitants in possession under the order of the court in 1883 have had sums paid to them which were raised out of corpus under the power of mortgaging.

But on the construction of this particular will I hold that the direction given by the testator for raising by mortgage out of corpus negatives any idea of bringing into hotchpot the sums which have been paid to the annuitants in possession. I think the result must be that the minutes as drawn must stand.

Company—Winding up—Director—Prosecution—Payment of costs out of assets — Discretion of court — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 167.

In considering whether leave ought to be given to institute criminal proceedings against the director of a company which is being wound up, and whether the costs of the prosecution should be paid out of the assets, the court will consider what course a good citizen, if placed in the position of the company, would feel it his duty to adopt.

The various matters which may be taken into consideration by the court, in order to enable it to arrive at a conclusion in such a case, considered.

On the 30th of October, 1901, an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the London and Globe Finance Corporation.

It was resolved by the statutory meetings of creditors and shareholders that the official receiver should be liquidator of the company, with a committee of inspection of eight members, five of whom were nominated by creditors and three by shareholders.

In the course of the public examinations, of Mr. Whitaker Wright and other directors and officials of the company, a state of affairs was disclosed which caused the official receiver, at the instance of the committee of inspection, to request the public prosecutor to take the requisite steps to institute criminal proceedings against Mr. Whitaker Wright for his alleged misconduct as managing director. The public prosecutor, acting on the advice of the law officers of the Crown, refused to institute a prosecution.

In order to enable a prosecution to be commenced funds to the amount of £1,250 were subscribed.

On the 20th of January, 1903, one of the members of the committee of inspection took out a summons for an order directing the official receiver to institute and carry on criminal proceedings against Mr. Whitaker Wright at the expense of the company's assets.

An offer was made to bring at least £1,250 into court towards meeting the expenses of the prosecution.

At a meeting of the committee of inspection, held on the 13th of February, 1903, four members were present, and unanimously desired a prosecution at the expense of the assets; of the other members of the committee who were not then present one would have voted with the four who were present, one was unable to say what course he would have adopted, one was abroad or inaccessible, and the last (who was alleged to be in business relations with Mr. Whitaker Wright) stated that he would have voted against a prosecution.

Out of creditors whose claims to the total amount of about £1,665,000 were admitted, creditors to the amount of about £650 000 desired a prosecution, others to the amount of £100,000 remained neutral, and one creditor for about £175,000 actively opposed a prosecution.

The admitted claims had been paid a dividend of 1s. in the pound, and it was expected that about another shilling in the pound would be paid. The estimated expenses of the prosecution would, it was stated, amount to about £5,000, and of this £3,750, equal to a dividend of about a half-penny in the pound on admitted claims, would fall upon the assets.

Counsel for the summons asked that it might be heard in camerâ, but Buckley, J., declined to adopt this course.

Avory, K.C., and Clavell Salter, for the summons.

Astbury, K.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the creditor opposing the prosecution.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and G. F. Hart, for the official receiver.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating that he had come to the conclusion that a primâ facie case had been made out against Mr. Whitaker Wright, proceeded to consider the principles upon which the power given by section 167 of the Companies Act, 1862, to direct the official receiver to conduct a prosecution at the expense of the assets should be exercised. A criminal prosecution ought not to be conducted by anyone with a view to personal profit, neither should it be instituted from motives of vengeance; the true motive of a prosecution should be a desire to punish the guilty party for the proper enforcement of the law and as a deterrent to others.

The true principle by which he should be guided is the consideration of the course which would be adopted by an honest and upright man who desired to do his duty to the State as a good citizen. If in any case such a man would feel it his duty to conduct a prosecution at his own expense and to his own loss, then in that case the court ought to direct a prosecution. Further, the court could, and in a proper case ought to, direct a prosecution without the assent and even notwithstanding the dissent of the class or many of the class at whose expense the prosecution would be instituted, for the section provided that the court might act "of its own motion."

There were other considerations to which due weight should be given, though in a less degree, among them being, first, the proportion of the class affected who respectively approved and disapproved of the institution of a prosecution, and secondly, the consideration whether the expense of a prosecution would bear hardly upon the creditors. There was nothing in this case to outweigh the wishes of the majority of the creditors who desired a prosecution, nor, under the circumstances of the case, ought an order to be refused because it would bear hardly upon the creditors.

In conclusion the official receiver was directed to institute and conduct against Mr. Whitaker Wright such proceedings as he might be advised, and an order was made for the payment of costs of the prosecution out of the company's assets so far as funds might be required in aid of the £1,250 or other larger sum to be brought into court.

In re DIXON.
DIXON v. CHARLESWORTH. (a)

Will—Absolute gift—Gift over on death "without a will and childless"—Repugnancy.

A testator, after an absolute gift of his residuary, real, and personal estate among his children equally, provided that in case any of his said children should die "without a will and childless," the share of the child or children so dying should go over to the surviving children.

Held, that the words "without a will and childless" were repugnant to the absolute estate previously given, and the gift consequently did not take effect.

A testator who died on the 6th of December, 1876, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his daughter Anne, his son Robert, and his niece Elizabeth upon trust for his wife for life, and after her decease upon trust for his children in equal shares, the shares of the daughters to be free from the control of their husbands, and to be inalienable otherwise than by will.

The will also provided that if any of the testator's children should die "without a will and childless," the share of such child or children should fall back into the residuary trust estate for equal division among the survivors.

The testator's wife died on the 11th of October, 1882.

The testator had six children, two of whom (Anne and Florence) were spinsters; one (Julia) died a spinster in 1899, having appointed Florence her executrix; Mary was a widow; Marjorie was married, and her husband was alive, and a son Robert.

The questions to be determined were whether the shares were now payable, and whether the gift over took effect.

William Baker, for Robert, Mary, and Florence.—The gift over was void for repugnancy.

Gulliver v. Vaux, 8 De G. M. & G. 167, and Holmes v. Godson, 4 W. R. 415, 8 De G. M & G. 162.

George Henderson, for Marjorie, argued that the gift over was valid.

SWINFEN EADY, J., said that according to the true construction of this will there was a gift to all the testator's children who should survive him. The daughter's shares were to be free from the control of their husbands and to be held for their separate use without power of anticipation. The words "If any die without a will" were repugnant to the previous gift, and the fact that the words "and childless" were added made no difference. Had the words "and childless" stood alone, the gift might have been good, but joined to the previous words they were repugnant to the absolute estate previously given. The shares were all now payable, other than that of the married daughter, whose husband was living. The share of the unmarried daughter who was dead went to her legal personal representative.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action to recover a sum alleged to be due from the defendants under a guarantee policy, whereby the defendants undertook to pay the plaintiffs the amount of certain drafts drawn by Gaze & Sons and accepted by the plaintiffs, in the event of Gaze & Sons not putting the acceptors in funds, at or before maturity, to meet the drafts.

The facts and the arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

June 30.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This action is brought on what is called a guarantee policy, dated the 1st of October, 1902, subscribed by the defendant Burnand in his own name and in the names of the other four defendants. The whole of the document is in print, with the exception of the dates, the signatures, and the amounts placed against the signatures. It is addressed to the plaintiffs, Messrs. C. J. Hambro & Son, and is in the following words: "To Messrs. C. J. Hambro & Son. In consideration of your accepting at our request the drafts of Henry Gaze & Sons (hereinafter called the drawers) to such an amount as you may think proper, such drafts to be drawn and accepted within one year from the 4th of June, 1902, and in consideration of the premium of £1 per cent. paid to us by the drawers on the execution hereof (the receipt whereof we hereby acknowledge), we, the underwriters, agree that if the drawers do not at or before maturity of any such drafts put you in funds to meet the same, we will, within thirty days of receipt of notice from you of such default on the part of the drawers, pay to you in cash the amount of such drafts and will further indemnify and hold you harmless against all moneys, loss, costs, charges, and expenses which you may have to pay or to which you may be put by reason of your having accepted such drafts, or by reason of any claims made by any company or person in respect of the transactions above mentioned, provided that our liability hereunder shall not exceed the amount of our respective subscriptions hereto, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the time of payment being demanded." The policy is then subscribed with the names of the five defendants, the names of the last four being subscribed in the handwriting of Burnand by procuration. On the 9th of October, 1902, the plaintiffs accepted a draft of Gaze & Sons (Limited), at ninety days' sight, for £1,000. The bill fell due on the 10th of January, 1903, and Gaze & Sons made default in finding money to meet it. Thereupon the plaintiffs claimed under the policy sued on to be paid by each of the five defendants his proportion—viz., £200 of the amount. The substantial question in the case is as to the liability of the four defendants, Draffen, Read, Mordan, and Elwell, to make good this claim; and it is with reference to their liability that I propose first to deal. I shall refer to Burnand's position later on. The first of the four defendants, Colonel Draffen, became a member of Lloyd's in the year 1885. He never personally did any business there, but occasionally he visited the room for the purpose of seeing his friend Burnand. The defendant Read is Burnand's father-in-law. He was for a long time connected with the railway business, but is now retired. He became a member of Lloyd's in 1891, but, like Draffen, he never personally did any business there. The defendant Mordan has been a member for Lloyd's for many years, and is well acquainted with the business done there; for some time he was in Burnand's office learning the business. The fourth defendant, Mr. Elwell, was at one time a merchant at Birmingham; he is now retired. He became a member of Lloyd's in 1887, but, like Draffen and Read, never personally did business there. The object which all these four defendants had in view in becoming members of Lloyd's was to underwrite risks there; and in order to carry out their object they employed the defendant Burnand, also a member of Lloyd's, to do the business for them. Membership is a condition imposed by the committee of Lloyd's on persons desiring to carry on the business of underwriting in the room. The terms of Burnand's employment were in each case reduced to writing. In Draffen's case the document states that Burnand "agrees to open and carry on at Lloyd's an underwriting account for and in the name of Draffen . . . but Burnand shall not underwrite any risks for Draffen to a greater extent than he, Burnand, shall underwrite for himself." Burnand was to receive half the profits by way of salary, but he was not to be considered a partner. There are other provisions in the agreement as to the books to be kept by Burnand and as to the auditing and rendering of accounts. In Read's case the agreement recites that Read, having been admitted a member of Lloyd's, is desirous of carrying on the business of an underwriter there and of appointing Burnand to conduct such business on his behalf. The agreement then provides that Burnand "shall act as the agent of Read for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's in the name and on behalf of Read, in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd's." Burnand's remuneration was to be £200 a year. The other provisions of the agreement, though not in the same words, are similar to those in Draffen's agreement. In Mordan's case the agreement recites that Mordan has for some time been carrying on the business of an underwriter at Lloyds, and it then provides that Burnand "shall act as the agent of Mordan for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's." Burnand was to have the sole management of the underwriting, and was to receive £250 a year and 20 per cent. of the net profits as remuneration for his services. The other provisions are substantially the same as in Draffen's and Read's cases. In the case of Elwell, the agreement recites that Elwell is desirous of carrying on the business of an underwriter at Lloyd's and of appointing Burnand to conduct such business on his behalf, and it then provides that "Burnand shall act as the agent of Elwell for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's in the name and on behalf of the said Elwell, in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd's." Burnand's remuneration is to be £260 a year and 20 per cent. of the net profits. The further provisions are in effect the same as in the other three cases. I have set out the terms of the four agreements because it is possible that different considerations might arise with respect to each case; but for my own part I think the four agreements are substantially the same in their effect; each amounts to an authority to Burnand to carry on an underwriting account at Lloyd's for and on behalf and in the name of the principal. For some years Burnand, acting for the defendants under the authority conferred by these documents, underwrote risks of different kinds at Lloyd's and rendered accounts to the defendants showing the profits and losses resulting therefrom. It was not until the year 1900 that the transactions began out of which the present dispute arises. It appears that at the end of 1899 a representative of Messrs. Barings mentioned to the plaintiffs (who carry on a banking business) that they, Barings, were engaged in financing a firm of Gaze & Sons. Gaze & Sons were at this time tourist agents engaged in a business similar to that carried on by the well-known firm of Messrs Cook & Sons. The financing consisted of accepting Gaze's drafts and taking by way of security what Barings described as "Lloyd's policies"; and it was suggested by Barings that the plaintiffs might think it worth their while to undertake a part of the business. The plaintiffs listened to this suggestion. They were satisfied with the introduction of the business by Barings, and they made little or no inquiry as to the stability of Gaze & Sons. As a result of this introduction Gaze & Sons put themselves into communication with the plaintiffs. This was at the end of 1899, and an arrangement was then made between Gaze & Sons and the plaintiffs that the latter should accept Gaze & Sons' drafts at three months, which Gaze & Sons should get discounted. The proceeds were to be used by Gaze & Sons for the purposes of their business. As the bills fell due Gaze & Sons were to furnish the plaintiffs with the necessary funds for retiring them. It was part of the bargain that Gaze & Sons should obtain and hand to the plaintiffs "Lloyd's policies," guaranteeing that Gaze & Sons should provide the necessary funds at the required time. The commission to be paid by Gaze & Sons to the plaintiffs for the accommodation was fixed at ½ per cent. on the amount of each acceptance. The first policy handed by Gaze & Sons to the plaintiffs was in the form now sued on, but it was for £3,000. It was dated the 1st of January, 1900, and was subscribed by the defendant Burnand in his own name and in the names of three of the other defendants—viz., Draffen, Read, and Elwell—for £250 each. It was also subscribed by a number of other underwriters for small sums, which made up an aggregate further amount of £2,000. In order to illustrate how the business was done I may read two letters of the 29th and 30th of December, 1899:

"London, Dec. 29, 1899.

"Dear Sirs,—We are delivering to you on Monday the form of guarantee agreed upon last Friday, underwritten by Messrs. Faber and Burnand and Angove for a total amount of £3,000, and are instructing our Paris agent to send you on Monday next a draft for £500, which please accept in accordance with our arrangement.

Faber, Burnand, and Angove were the agents of the smaller underwriters, who had underwritten the first policy for £2,000. Soon after this policy was handed over, bills to the amount of £2,000 were drawn by Gaze & Son on the plaintiffs, and were accepted. Subsequently further policies were handed to the plaintiffs to secure additional bills, until, by November, 1900, the amount afloat of the plaintiffs' acceptances to Gaze & Sons' drafts reached as much as £14,500. It was noticed by the plaintiffs that the later policies—viz. those after June, 1901—brought to them by Gaze & Sons, were subscribed only by Burnand and his names; the other underwriters whose names appeared on the first policy for two-thirds of the amount no longer being parties. When the plaintiffs observed this they insisted on Gaze & Sons procuring what are called "solvency policies"—that is to say, policies guaranteeing the solvency of the underwriters. These Gaze & Sons accordingly took out with the Royal Exchange Insurance Company and handed to the plaintiffs. Thus the plaintiffs had a triple security for their advances: they had the liability of Gaze & Sons, the guarantee of Burnand and his names, and a warranty by third parties of the solvency of Burnand and his names. After the total amount of the advances had reached £14,500 the bills began to run off. By some means or other, probably by borrowing money elsewhere, Gaze & Sons found means to reduce the amount of their obligations to the plaintiffs, so that by the end of 1901 the bills afloat only amounted to £7,500. These bills were renewed from time to time during 1902, and the last of the series of renewals are now all in the hands of the plaintiffs who have had to take them up out of their own moneys by reason of Gaze & Sons' default. At no time during the period over which this business extended—that is to say, 1900, 1901, 1902—did the plaintiffs see Mr. Burnand. The business between the plaintiffs and Gaze & Sons seems to have been conducted, so far as Gaze & Sons were concerned, by a Mr. Parry, the managing director of the company, and by nobody else. But it now appears that during nearly all this time Burnand was a director of Gaze & Sons. He joined the board in August, 1900; and not only was he a director, but he was personally engaged in financial dealings with that company. Before the end of 1900 the plaintiffs became aware of the fact that Burnand was a director of Gaze & Sons, but they knew no more than that fact would convey to them. The company was never, in my opinion, solvent—that is to say, it never held real assets representing its nominal capital and its liabilities. It was not solvent when the first advances were obtained from the plaintiffs; its position after that date became rapidly worse; and it is now being wound up and has practically no assets. It was very much to Burnand's personal interest to keep Gaze & Sons going; for, having regard to the accounts which I have seen, the stoppage of Gaze & Sons at any time would have meant the stoppage of Burnand, or at all events would have caused him serious inconvenience. Burnand did not go into the witness-box during the trial before me, nor was Mr. Parry called by either side; but I have no doubt whatever that Burnand knew at all times what the financial position of Gaze & Sons was, and that in underwriting the Gaze policies (including the policies sued on) he was acting for himself and in furtherance of his own interests, and not for or in the interests of the four defendants with whose case I am now dealing. His conduct makes this abundantly clear. Transactions similar to those with the plaintiffs were carried out with other financial houses so that by the end of 1902 the amount owing by Gaze & Sons to different creditors reached the large total of £110,000, the whole being bolstered up by policies such as that now sued on. Thus Burnand has purported to bind each of the four defendants to an amount of upwards of £20,000 on one risk—namely, the solvency of Gaze & Sons. He never obtained any premium for the policies. Gaze & Sons never paid a farthing for them, although each policy contains the statement that Gaze & Sons have paid 1 per cent. premium. Indeed Gaze & Sons' cashier stated in the witness-box that his instructions were to pay no premiums because none were due. Burnand never entered the policies in his business books, where in the ordinary course they should have appeared. He never introduced them into any of the accounts which he rendered to the defendants. At times during the three years over which the transactions extended Gaze & Sons made default in providing money to take up their draft, whereupon the holders of the corresponding policies wrote to the defendants demanding payment. These letters were addressed to the defendants at Lloyd's, the only address then known to the writers. Burnand intercepted the letters and destroyed them, and managed out of his own means, or out of Gaze & Sons', to find the required money, and so to quiet the bankers for the time being. On one occasion, in April, 1902, Mordan received information from a banker which led him to fear that his name was on policies guaranteeing Gaze & Sons. He accordingly went to Gaze & Sons, office to ascertain if it was true. He saw one of the clerks, who said he would inquire and let him know. Later in the day Lawrance, the cashier, under the instructions of Parry, wrote the following letter:—"68, Old Bailey, London, E.C., 24th April, 1902. Dear Sir,—Referring to your call here this afternoon, I beg to say that I have communicated to our chairman the object of your visit, and he wishes me to inform you that your information is quite inaccurate, and, should you deem it necessary to see him, he will be glad to keep any appointment at Gaze's office during to-morrow afternoon.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully, T. B. LAWRENCE.—P. C. Mordan, Esq." According to Lawrence's evidence both he and Parry well knew that the letter was untrue. I cannot doubt that Burnand knew of this letter and approved of its being sent. Mordan's answer was as follows:—"Private and confidential Sanfils, Reigate, 25th of April, 1902. Mr. T. B. Lawrence. Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of yesterday's date, the information I have received was private and confidential, and I have still no reason to doubt its accuracy. Now you are aware that no one is authorised to sign guarantee insurance policies in my name, and that any claims arising thereon would be immediately repudiated. I have nothing more to say. Yours faithfully, PERCY C. MORDAN." At the end of 1902 the present plaintiffs issued a writ against all the five defendants in respect of a default made by Gaze & Sons in providing money for an earlier bill than the bill mentioned in the present action. Burnand instructed a firm of solicitors to appear to this writ. The four defendants never heard of it. Judgment was signed, and when attempts were made to serve bankruptcy notices on them personally in 1903 the defendants became aware for the first time that they had been sued. Some of them (it may be all of them) paid that claim in the vain hope that there were no more. Shortly afterwards the writ in the present action was issued (the 16th of February, 1903). These facts confirm the view I take—namely, that Burnard was issuing the policies for his own purposes, and not for or on behalf of the other four defendants. It was contended on the plaintiffs' behalf in this connection that the earlier policies issued in 1900 were at all events honestly subscribed by Burnand on behalf of the four names, and that the policy sued on, though dated in 1902, was merely a renewal of one of these earlier policies and could not, therefore, be regarded as a policy issued for Burnand's sole benefit. I do not, however, take this view. In my opinion the business was Burnand's, and only Burnand's, from beginning to end. The case, therefore, stands thus. Burnand held the written authorities already referred to. The plaintiffs never saw them or asked to see them or knew of their existence. Burnand issued the policy sued on for his own purposes, and not for or on behalf of the other four defendants. The plaintiffs took it without inquiry, relying solely on the representation on its face. The question is, are the four defendants liable? The first point taken on their behalf was that the underwriting of documents such as that sued on was not business which came within the meaning of the authorities at all. It was said that it was not insurance, and therefore not within the authority; and further it was said that it was not business ordinarily transacted at Lloyd's. Perhaps in a strict sense it would be right to say that the contract sued on is not a contract of insurance; it is not a contract of indemnity against loss; it is an undertaking to pay a sum of money to the holder if someone else fails to find it at the proper time; a loss is not a necessary condition to the liability. But I do not place this narrow construction on the authority given by the defendants to Burnand. I think the authority extends to cover all business ordinarily done at Lloyd's. The words are "underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter there." Many witnesses were called before me from Lloyd's to speak as to the kinds of business done there, and their evidence satisfies me that the underwriting of policies such as the one sued on forms part of that business. It is, of course, not nearly so common as the underwriting of marine risks, but it is nevertheless part of the ordinary business, and indeed one of the defendants (Elwell) in terms said he understood it to be so. The next point was that, even if the authorities given to Burnand warranted the signing of documents such as this, yet, as this policy was not signed for or on behalf of the four defendants, but for Burnand's benefit only, it did not bind them. It was said that such a contract was outside the authority which he held. There are only three ways in which a man can be bound by a contract made by one who purports to act as his agent in making it. First, he will be bound if the agent had in fact his authority to make the contract on his behalf; secondly, he will be bound if, though the agent had in fact no such authority, he has held out the agent as having such authority and has thereby induced the other party to enter into the contract; and, thirdly, he will become bound if, the contract having been entered into in his name but without his authority, he subsequently ratifies the agent's act. With the second of these three I am not concerned, for the plaintiffs' counsel disclaimed any intention of relying on a holding out, and I think he was right in doing so. There clearly was no holding out. Before the making of the contract sued on the plaintiffs never were in communication either with the defendants or with Burnand, nor did they know of the existence of the written authorities which the defendants had given to Burnand. Both the defendants and Burnand were strangers to them, and remained so to the end of the business. When the policies were handed by Gaze &

Sons to the plaintiffs the only representation made to the plaintiffs was that Burnand had authority to sign for the defendants. This representation was made by Burnand on the face of the policies and in no other way, and apparently the plaintiffs were satisfied; they made no enquiries and took the risk of the representation being true or false. In such circumstances it seems to me that as against the four defendants it is impossible to set up an estoppel by reason of a holding out. It appears to me that it is impossible to treat the representation which Burnand made when he signed the policies per procuration as the representation of the other defendants. It was untrue, untrue to his knowledge; and, in my opinion, an agent to make contracts on behalf of another has no power by his own unauthorized falsehood to create an estoppel against his principal so as in effect to entirely alter the scope of the authority. Estoppel can only arise out of the conduct of the man against whom it is set up. A case of ratification was attempted to be set up on behalf of the plaintiffs, but it was confined to two of the defendants—namely, Draffen and Mordan; it was admitted that it could not be relied on for the purpose of fixing either Read or Elwell with liability. With regard to Draffen and Mordan, the acts which are said to amount to a ratification were, in my opinion, not even evidence of a ratification. I need not detail what they were. It is enough to say that they had no reference to the policy sued on. At the time the acts were done these two defendants were in ignorance of the existence of this policy. They had never heard of it. To constitute a valid ratification of the unauthorized acts of an agent "there must be full knowledge of what those acts were or such an unqualified adoption that the inference may properly be drawn that the principal intended to take upon himself the responsibility for such acts whatever they were." See Marsh v. Joseph, 45 W. R. 209, [1897] 1 Ch. 213, at p. 246. In the present case there was nothing in the facts which would justify me in drawing an inference of the kind mentioned; and as to knowledge I have said that at the time of the alleged acts of ratification the defendants knew nothing about the policy sued on. Holding out and ratification being thus disposed of, it only remains for me to consider whether Burnand had in fact authority to bind, and did bind, his principals by the contract which he purported to make on their behalf. This question presents, to my mind, some difficulty. The plaintiffs contend that Burnand was in fact the general agent of the other four defendants to make contracts of the kind sued on, and that, having purported to make such a contract on their behalf, the defendants are bound. On the other hand, the defendants say that the only authority which Burnand had was to make contracts for their benefit and on their behalf, and that, this contract not having been made for their benefit or on their behalf, but for Burnand's benefit only, they are not bound. In the absence of any holding out, I know of no means of deciding upon these contentions except by a reference to the documents under which alone Burnand's authority existed. These documents all declare that he is authorized to underwrite policies "in the name and on behalf of" the principals; nothing else. Does such a mandate authorize the making of a contract which is to enure only to the benefit of the agent? For my part, I think it does not. The mandate authorizes the making of contracts for and on behalf of the principals. It does not authorize the making of contracts for and on behalf of the agent. No doubt there are many cases in which a general agent to make contracts of a certain kind has been held to bind his principal by a contract of that kind, though made for his own purposes. But all such cases proceed upon the doctrine of estoppel by holding out. They are cases in which the other contracting party has been induced to enter into the contract by a representation made to him by the principal that the agent's acts were authorized. I can find no case where the extent of the authority of a general agent not held out as such has been measured by anything outside or beyond the actual terms in which the agency is created. Sometimes, in order to ascertain whether the principal is liable, the question is asked whether what the agent has done is within "the scope" of his employment. It is in my opinion a loose and unsatisfactory test of the liability; but, applying it in this case, I am satisfied that what Burnand did was not within the scope of his employment. It was to his own knowledge wholly without its scope. Nor is the case one of negligent or of tortious conduct in carrying out the agency entrusted to him. If it were, some liability might fall on the defendants. The making of the contract sued on was a wilful act, not done in carrying out the agency at all, but done wholly outside it. In my view Burnand had no more right to sign this policy on the defendant's behalf than he had to forge their signatures to it. Again, it is sometimes said that where one or two innocent parties must suffer from fraud of a third person, he who has enabled the third party to commit the wrong ought to bear the loss. I do not think this test is applicable to the present case, where the only question is one of authority. But even if it were applicable, it would, in my opinion, be wrong to say that the defendants had in fact enabled Burnand to commit the fraud All they had done was to authorize him to underwrite risks for them; and the giving of such authority afforded him no additional facility for committing frauds. Then again, it is said that even if the plaintiffs had asked to see the authorities, and had read them, they had no means of ascertaining whether the policies were issued for the benefit of the principals or not. That may be true. But my answer is that a man is not to be held liable because it has been difficult or even impossible to ascertain whether he was liable or not If a person contracts with an agent it is for him to see as best he can that the agent is acting within his authority. If the authority exists by reason of a holding out, then the person making the contract must take care that the agent does nothing which the holding out does not warrant; if the authority does not arise from a holding out, then care must be taken to see that what is being done is within the terms of the actual authority. It is often difficult or inconvenient or impolitic to make inquiries about an agent's authority, but that circumstance does not make the principal liable where he is otherwise not liable. The other contracting party takes the risk, and though now and then it turns out that the risk is serious and real, the event is not of sufficient frequency to interfere with business. The view then that I take of this case is that the plaintiffs are not entitled to rely on any authority except such as is to be found in the documents; that the authority to be there found is limited to the making of policies "for" the defendants; that the policy sued on was not made "for" the defendants, and that therefore they are not bound by it. In shorter words, I think it is the plaintiffs whom Burnand cheated and not the defendants, and that the loss must lie where it has fallen. The law is, I think accurately stated in Story's Law of Agency, s. 133, at p. 149 of the ninth edition. Several cases were cited in the course of the argument, and I think it is better that I should notice them. On behalf of the plaintiffs the case of Summers v. Solomon, 5 W. R. 660, 7 E. & B. 879, was relied on. It is a case which shows that a general agent may pledge his principal's credit though he does it only for his own benefit. But when examined it will be found that it was a case of holding out. The court found as a fact that the principal had made a continuing representation that goods bought by the agent on a representation by him that they were required for the principal's business would be paid for by the principal. The judgment proceeded on this ground. Then an expression of Lord Davey's in Keighley v. Durrant, [1901] A. C. 240, at p. 256, 49 W. R. Dig. 41, was mentioned: "Where the intention to contract on behalf of another is expressed in the contract, it passes from the region of speculation to that of fact and becomes irrevocable." This detached passage is, however, quite useless unless read with its context and with reference to the case then under consideration, and when so read it will be seen to have no bearing on the question which I am dealing with. A third case relied upon was In re Tiedemann & Ledermann Frères, [1899] 2 Q. B. 66, 47 W. R. Dig. 161. That case is not in point. I do not doubt that if the defendants had ascertained the existence of these policies, and had chosen to ratify them, they could have done so. For the purpose of ratification it is sufficient that the contracts on their face purport to be made on the defendants' behalf. But the question which I have to consider is not whether the defendants could have ratified, but whether the contracts bind them without ratification. Another case cited on behalf of the plaintiffs was Thorne v. Heard, 44 W. R. 155, [1895] A. C., 495. The question in that case was whether the respondents were "party or privy" to the fraud of one Searle within the meaning of section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, so as to debar them from taking advantage of the Statute of Limitations, and Lord Herschell, at p. 502, refers in general terms to the circumstances in which a principal may or may not be liable for the torts of his agent. He says: "It appears to me perfectly clear that in order to charge any person with a fraud which has not been personally committed by him the agent who has committed the fraud must have committed it while acting within the scope of his authority, while doing something and purporting to do something on behalf of the principal. If the person is doing something within the scope of his authority and purporting to do it for his principal, although in doing it he commits a wrong which his principal neither sanctioned nor intended, the principal may be liable. But if the person, although he has been employed as agent, is not, in the transaction which is the wrongful act, acting for or purporting to be acting for the principal, it seems to me impossible to treat that as the fraud of the principal." This passage was cited as an authority for the proposition that it is sufficient, in order to make the principal responsible, that the agent should purport to do the act for the principal; and that it does not matter that, in fact, it is not done for the principal. I do not think the passage is really an authority for such a proposition. Lord Herschell was dealing with the responsibility of a principal for the torts of his agent; and, in using the disjunctive "or" in the last sentence, he certainly did not mean to say that by merely purporting to act for the principal he could make the principal responsible for a tort. Another case cited was Montaignac v. Shitta, 15 App. Cas. 357, 39 W. R. Dig. 178. But this case is of no real value for the purpose in hand. An examination of the facts will show that the agent was acting within his authority, although, perhaps, improvidently; there is no suggestion that he was acting for his own benefit. Moreover, as Lord Herschell says in his judgment, the only question under review was a question of fact. The authorities cited in support of the defendants' contention appear also to be inconclusive. No case in contract was referred to in which it is clearly laid down that a general agent has no authority to bind his principal by a contract of the kind authorized by the terms of the agency, but made for the agent's own purposes. But some cases in tort which are, perhaps, analogous were cited. In The British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co., 35 W. R. 590, 18 Q. B. D. 714, it appeared that the defendant company had held out their secretary to the plaintiffs as a person to answer inquiries as to the validity of the defendant company's bonds. The plaintiffs accordingly made inquiries as to the validity of certain bonds which had been offered to them in pledge, and the secretary answered that they were validly issued; this statement was untrue to the secretary's knowledge, and was made by him for his own ends, and not in the interest of his employers. In an action of deceit the defendant company were held not liable. It was said that though the secretary must be taken to have had authority to answer questions of the kind put to him, he had not been held out as having authority to answer such questions when acting for his own ends and not for the benefit of his employers (see per Lord Esher, M.R., 18 Q. B. D., at p. 716). No doubt Bowen, L.J., and Fry, L.J., rely on the fact that the alleged estoppel could not bind the defendants, inasmuch as they were a corporation, but Lord Esher, M.R., puts the decision on the broader ground—namely, that the statement, having been made by the secretary to serve his own ends, could not bind his employers. Lord Selborne, in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W.R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317, at p. 326, says: "The master is liable for every such wrong of his servant or agent as is committed in the course of his service, and for the master's benefit" (per Willes, J., in Barwick v. The English Joint Stock Banking Co., 15 W. R. 877, L. R. 2 Ex. 259), because although the master may not have authorized the particular act, "he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which that agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in." To the principle so stated no exception can, in my opinion, be taken, though the manner in which the master is to be answerable, and the nature and extent of the remedies against him, may vary according to the nature and circumstances of particular cases. . . . It is a principle, not of the law of torts, or of fraud or deceit, but of the law of agency, equally applicable whether the agency is for a corporation (in a matter within the scope of the corporate powers) or for an individual; and the decisions in all these cases proceeded, not on the grounds of any imputation of vicarious fraud to the principal, but because (as it was well put by Willes, J., in Barwick's case), "with respect to the question whether a principal is answerable for the act of his agent in the course of his master's business, no sensible distinction can be drawn between the case of fraud and the case of any other wrong." And the opinion of Lord James of Hereford in Whitechurch v. Cavanagh, 50 W. R. 218, [1902] A. C. 117, at p. 134, was also read in support of the defendants' case. The rules laid down in these cases of tort may not be strictly applicable to a case of contract, but they appear to me to support the principle that an agent who is not in fact acting for his principal cannot bind him by merely purporting so to act. Since the argument my attention has been called to a passage in Story on Agency, which is to be found at p. 91 of the ninth edition (section 73). In support of this statement there is cited the American case of North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill,

262. That case appears to be so much in point that I think I ought to refer to it in some detail. The facts are shortly stated in the head note. The terms of the authority are set out on p. 264 of the report. It will be noticed that both the principal and the agent took this document to the plaintiff bank and left it with the manager, the object, of course, being that the bank should act upon it. The case was tried before a jury and the judge directed the jury that as Jacob Fowler had exceeded his authority the plaintiffs could not recover. On appeal to a court of three judges, it was held by Cowen, J., in a judgment in which another judge (Bronson, J.) concurred, that the direction was wrong. The third judge (Chief Justice Nelson) dissented. The reasoning of Cowen, J., is to be found at p. 266. Now I think there is a mistake here. In my opinion the principal is not affected by the lie which the agent tells, unless there was something done by the principal or properly imputable to him which led the other contracting party to believe that he might rely on the statement. In the absence of such conduct on the part of the principal, I do not think the declarations of the agent are evidence against the principal. Nor do I think that the authorities which Cowen, J., cites in support of his proposition really bear it out. Many, if not all, of them will be found to turn upon estoppel by the conduct of the principal himself. The judgment of Nelson, C.J., appears to me in accordance with principle and with authority. Giving the whole case the best consideration I can, I feel myself bound to hold that the four defendants are not responsible on the policy sued on. I have now only to deal with the defendant Burnand. That he is liable in this action I have no doubt. It was said that the directors of Gaze & Sons had borrowed beyond the company's borrowing powers, and that therefore, the company were not legally compellable to pay the debt to the plaintiffs; and it was argued that, Gaze & Sons not being legally compellable to pay, Burnand could not be liable. I do not know whether it is true that the borrowing powers had been exceeded. But even if it is true, I do not think it matters. For a good consideration Burnand promised to pay if for any reason Gaze & Sons did not do so. Gaze and Sons did not pay. Therefore Burnand must do so. There will be judgment against Burnand for £250 and interest, with costs; and judgment for the other four defendants with costs, the plaintiffs to have costs against all the defendants of the issue as to whether the guarantee was Lloyd's business.

Privy Council.

[From the Supreme Court of New South Wales.]

Feb. 13.

WALKER v. WALKER. (a.)

Practice—Appeal in formâ pauperis—Appeal to Privy Council without leave—New South Wales, Law of.

It is a rule of general, if not universal, application that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council will not entertain a petition for leave to prosecute an appeal in formâ pauperis, where the court below has power to grant leave on the usual conditions, unless leave has been applied for within due time to the court from which it is proposed that the appeal should be brought.

This was a petition for special leave to appeal and to prosecute the appeal in formâ pauperis.

The circumstances under which it arose are dealt with in their lordships' judgment.

Beebee, for the petitioner.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, SHAND, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This petition was before their lordships on the 3rd of February. It was an application for special leave to appeal and to prosecute the appeal in formâ pauperis. It appeared that no application for leave to appeal had been made to the Supreme Court of New South Wales from which it was desired that an appeal should be brought. On that ground, apart from all other objections, it seemed to their lordships that the application was irregular.

The learned counsel for the petitioner referred their lordships to a case in New South Wales, Ex parte the Commissioner for Railways (20 N. S. W. Rep. Equity, 28), and stated that that case was understood in New South Wales to have laid down the rule that a litigant desiring to prosecute his appeal to his Majesty in Council in formâ pauperis ought to "apply direct to the Privy Council" without applying in the first instance to the Supreme Court for leave to appeal. Their lordships do not think that the judgment of Simpson, J., to which particular reference was made, is open to that construction. All that the learned judge seems to have meant was that the Supreme Court could not authorize an intending appellant to prosecute his appeal before his Majesty in Council in formâ pauperis.

It was also suggested that the practice of this committee had not been uniform, and the registrar informed their lordships that he could not say that there was no foundation for that suggestion.

As it is most important that the practice should be uniform, and the rule clearly laid down, their lordships directed that further inquiries should be made, and that in the meantime the petition should stand over.

The registrar has informed their lordships that during the last four years there have been ten applications for leave to prosecute an appeal in formâ pauperis bearing on the point under consideration, and that in one of those cases leave was granted, although it appeared from the petition that no application for leave to appeal had been made to the court below. The circumstances of that case were so peculiar as to justify a departure from the ordinary rule. With the exception of that case the practice on the point now in question seems to have been uniform, and certainly there was one case—an unreported case—from New South Wales (Comber v. Hogg, heard on the 27th of November, 1900) in which it appears from the shorthand notes that the application was refused expressly on the ground that no application for leave to appeal had been made to the Supreme Court.

Their lorships desire that it should be clearly understood, as a rule of general if not universal application, that this committee will not entertain a petition for leave to prosecute an appeal in formâ pauperis, where the court below has power to grant leave on the usual conditions, unless in the first instance an application for leave to appeal has been made within due time to the court from which it is proposed that the appeal should be brought.

The order in the present case from which it was proposed to appeal was made on the 23rd of May, 1901. The time for applying to the Supreme Court for leave to appeal is the period of fourteen days only. When the prescribed period has expired without any application having been made for leave to appeal, the successful litigant is entitled to rely upon his decree and to feel assured that the litigation is at an end. The application for leave to appeal and to appeal in formâ pauperis was not lodged in the Privy Council Office until the expiration of more than eighteen months from the date of the order. In these circumstances the application, even if it were not irregular, would be absurd. But their lordships desire it to be understood that, in their opinion, this petition ought to be refused on the ground that no application for leave to appeal was made within due time to the Supreme Court in New South Wales.

Their lordships will accordingly humbly advise his Majesty to dismiss the petition, but that in accordance with the usual practice the Council office fees should be remitted.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) June 10.

In re MACINTOSH, DIXON, & CO. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Practice—Bill of costs—Order for taxation—Time limit—Extension of time—Jurisdiction of taxing officer—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, regulation 57.

The direction in an order of course for taxation of a bill delivered more than one month and less than twelve months, on the client's application, that "the said master is to make his certificate in a month, unless the said master shall think fit to extend the time to enable him to make his certificate, or this order is to be of no effect," is not a direction by the court or a judge which deprives the taxing officer of the jurisdiction given to him by regulation 57 of rule 27 of order 65, and consequently the taxing-master can grant an extension of time for the taxation on an application made after the expiration of the month limited by the order. Time limits, however, whether prescribed by section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, or by the rules of the court, ought not to be lightly disregarded; and therefore such an extension of time should not be made as of course, but only if it appears to the taxing officer to be required by the justice of the case.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J.

In December, 1902, an order of course was made for taxation of a solicitor's bill, which had been delivered in January, 1902. The order directed taxation in the ordinary form and concluded with these words: "But the said master is to make his certificate within a month (unless the said master shall extend the time to make his certificate) or this order is to be of no effect."

The order was not served upon the solicitor until after the expiration of the month.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The master appointed a day for taxation. The solicitor attended on that day and took the objection that the month having expired there was no longer any jurisdiction to tax. The master held that there was jurisdiction.

The solicitor then moved before Byrne, J., to stay proceedings.

Byrne, J., held that the order for taxation was abortive, a month having elapsed before the service of the order, so that the taxing-master had no longer jurisdiction to tax. He accordingly stayed the proceedings.

The client appealed.

By regulation 57 of rule 27 of order 65 "The taxing-officer shall have power to limit or extend the time for any proceeding before him, and where by any general order, or any order of the court or a judge, a time is appointed for any proceeding before or by a taxing-officer, unless the court or judge shall otherwise direct, such officer shall have power from time to time to extend the time appointed upon such terms (if any) as the justice of the case may require, and although the application for the same is not made until after the expiration of the time appointed, it shall not be necessary to make a certificate or order for this purpose, unless required for any special purpose."

Rowlands, for the appellant.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument: In re Webster, 39 W. R. 535, [1891] 2 Ch. 102; In re Taylor, Sons, & Tarbuck, 42 W. R 329, [1894] 1 Ch. 503; Whistler v. Hancock, 26 W. R. 211, 3 Q. B. D. 83; Wallis v. Hepburn. 3 Q. B. D. 84*n*; King v. Davenport, 27 W. R. 798, 4 Q. B. D. 402; Carter v. Stubbs, 29 W. R. 132, 6 Q. B. D. 116; and Collinson v. Jeffery, 44 W. R. 311, [1896] 1 Ch. 644.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment the question which we have to decide in this case turns upon regulation 57 of rule 27 of order 65, but although in my opinion the decision must turn wholly upon the words of that regulation, I propose very shortly to point out how this question arises. Taxation of bills of costs is dealt with under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843; that section regulates, among other things, the power of solicitors to bring actions to recover the amount of their bills of costs; they cannot bring any action until after the expiration of one month after the delivery of a bill of costs. The section then deals with the reference of those bills of costs for taxation. The second paragraph begins, "And upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill within such month it shall be lawful." Then there are words giving the court or judge power to tax such bills, and the paragraph concludes, "And the court or judge making such reference shall restrain such attorney or solicitor . . . from commencing any action or suit touching such demand pending such reference." The reason for the limitation of one month in such cases as the time within which the party chargeable is to be entitled as of course to this reference is no doubt that the statute contemplates that pending the reference the solicitor shall be debarred from enforcing his demand based on his bill of costs.

The next paragraph provides for cases in which the application is not made within the month. It says: "And in case no such application as aforesaid shall be made within such month as aforesaid, then it shall be lawful for such reference to be made as aforesaid either upon the application of the attorney or solicitor . . . or upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill with such directions and subject to such conditions as the court or judge making such reference shall think proper, and such court or judge may restrain such attorney or solicitor . . . from commencing or prosecuting any action or suit touching such demand pending such reference upon such terms as shall be thought proper." Then follows a proviso that taxation after verdict or after twelve months shall only be allowed in special circumstances. One sees, therefore, throughout these provisions very good reason why these limitations should have been put in this way, because one finds that pending the reference the right of the solicitor to enforce payment of his bill of costs is really suspended. In this particular case the order was not obtained until a long time after the delivery of the bills of costs. The bills were delivered on the 16th of January, 1902; the order was obtained on the 1st of December, 1902—that is to say, when the twelve months had nearly elapsed—and it was not in fact served on the solicitors until the 7th of January, 1903—that is, within a week of the lapse of twelve months from the delivery of the bills, and more than a month after the order had been obtained. In these circumstances, when the matter came before the master, it was objected that his jurisdiction was gone, because the order for taxation concludes with these words "but the said master is to make his certificate in a month (unless the said master shall extend the time to make his certificate) or this order is to be of no effect." It is said that the month having elapsed from the date of the order the master had no longer any jurisdiction—that is, any jurisdiction under the order as it stood, or any jurisdiction to grant any extension of the time. It was said that any jurisdiction or power which the master had under the order was totally gone when the month had run out, and from that time forward the order was dead and of no effect. With one argument put forward by counsel for the respondents I am inclined to agree—that is to say, that if the actual words of the order itself, with nothing else to assist, are taken primâ facie the power to extend must be exercised within the limit of the month. The case is analogous to the cases which often arise in respect of submission to arbitration. You constantly find submissions containing a limit of time within which the award is to be made, and then there is a power given to the arbitrator to enlarge the time for making the award, and it has been held again and again that the power of enlargement must be exercised by the arbitrator within the time limited by the words of the submission itself as being the time within which the award is to be made unless the power of enlargement is exercised by the arbitrator. Primâ facie, therefore, I should have been inclined to read these words as counsel for the respondents invited us to do. That is, as meaning that the power to extend the time must be exercised within the month limited by the order. But though I should have so read these words apart from anything else, in my opinion we must read this particular order in the light of regulation 57. [His lordship read the regulation and continued.] I wish to say with regard to those words that in my judgment it cannot be said that by the terms of this order the court or judge "has otherwise directed"—that is to say, has directed that the taxing-master shall not have this power of extension. Having said that, I have merely to construe these words. As I read these words they are words which by necessary implication affirm that the power thus given to the taxing-master to extend the time may be exercised even after the time appointed has elapsed. If that is so, there is an end to all question in this case, because this is not an appeal with reference to the discretion of the taxing-master. I am by no means certain that such an appeal ought to be entertained if it was an appeal from his discretion. It is a mere question whether reading the order and regulation 57 together the taxing-master has this power, notwithstanding the expiration of the time. I think he has. But I do not wish to be understood as saying that because I think he has this power it is a power which ought to be exercised as of course or freely. The reason why I referred to the terms of section 37, which expressly provides for the suspension of the rights of the solicitor during the reference, was because I thought that the time limit contained in the common order for taxation obtained by the client under this section after the expiration of one month, but before the expiration of twelve months from the delivery of the bill, was inserted for the express purpose of preventing the reference from being used in a way which would be unjust or oppressive to the solicitor. In these circumstances the time limits should not be lightly regarded or easily dispensed with by the taxing-master or anyone else. I think that in the case of an order obtained, as was the present one, very nearly twelve months after the delivery of the bill, and then not served until more than a month after it had been made, and within a few days of the expiration of the twelve months, it is impossible to suppose that the taxing-master could make an order extending the time without very seriously considering whether the circumstances were such as to justify him in so doing having regard to the obvious intention of the statute that the reference should not be used in a manner oppressive to the solicitor. The appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. In the first place, I wish to point out that the cases cited before us really have no application to the point which we have to decide. For example, cases which were decided under the provisions now embodied in ord. 64, r. 7, have no application. I mean cases like Whistler v. Hancock, Wallis v. Hepburn, and King v. Davenport. Those cases were of this kind. An order had been made dismissing an action unless the plaintiff took certain steps within a specified time, and it was held on the terms of the order that if these steps were not taken within the time the action stood dismissed inevitably. In those cases there was no power in the court to extend the time. But cases of that kind have no application to cases like the present. In those cases nothing could be done to escape the exigency of the order except by way of appeal, but in the cases before us, and in similar cases, the arguments which were effective in those cases do not apply, because the order for taxation expressly provides for an extension of the time within which the certificate of the taxing-master may be made within which the order is to be effective. As to the meaning of the provision for the extension of time in the order in the case before us, with reference to the question when the extension has to be granted, I shall have something to say presently. But I wish to point out that that order is entirely distinct and different from the orders in the cases under ord. 64, r. 7. Further, I have to point out that the two other authorities cited, In re Webster and In re Taylor, Sons, & Tarbuck, have no real bearing on the case before us, for in those cases there had been no extension of time by the taxing-master. There is, therefore, no case governing the point which is now before us, and it turns entirely on the wording of regulation 57 of r. 27 of ord. 65. That regulation does provide that the taxing-master may extend the time within which an act has to be done by him after the expiration of the time for doing that act. I quite agree that without that express power the respondents on this appeal would be clearly right. But there are those words, and I think it would be impossible to say that the rule as a whole does not apply to the order for taxation in this case. That order is a very common form of order. It is the form which is applicable to all orders obtained by the client after the expiration of one month and before the expiration of twelve months from the delivery of the bill. And if this provision in regulation 57 as to extending the time after the expiration of the time appointed does not apply to an order of this kind, it is difficult to see to what order it does apply. For the other orders do not contain any provision such as we have here limiting the time within which the certificate has to be made. In my opinion regulation 57 does apply to this case, and the taxing-master has power to extend the time even though the original time limited by the order has expired. And I may point out that the provision in regulation 57 is a very useful provision. Take, for example, a case in which the whole taxation has been practically completed within the month, but, owing to the exigencies of his duties, the taxing-master has not had time to make his certificate. It would be very hard if the taxing-master could not extend the time. I think, therefore, that the words to which I have referred in regulation 57 are very useful words, and that it would be a great pity if we should be compelled to cut them down in any way. I agree with what was said by my lord that it ought not to be considered by the taxing-master that the extension of the time is to be a mere matter of course. I think that the taxing-master ought to consider carefully in each particular case whether justice does require an extension of time, and upon what terms the extension ought to be granted. Personally, I think it possible that if I had been the taxing-master I should not have extended the time in this case. But that is not now before us. The only point before us is whether there is power in the taxing-master to extend the time as he has done. Let me refer shortly to two arguments which have been used against the view which I am expressing. First it is said that under the very terms of the order it ceases to have any effect after the expiration of the appointed time. The certificate not having been made within the month, and there being no extension of time within the month, it is said that the order was dead and could not be revived. In my opinion that is not the right view to take of this order. I do not think that it was dead in that sense. It is more like a case of suspended animation, if I may be permitted to say so. In my opinion the power to extend the time in this order means power to extend it according to the rules—that is, according to regulation 57. The next argument was that the provision as to extension in regulation 57 is not operative if the court or judge shall otherwise direct. With reference to that argument I would point out that this order contains no direction to the contrary within the meaning of those words. If the order had said unless the said taxing-master shall extend the time to make his certificate within the month, then I agree that the judge would have otherwise directed, but the order does not say that; it may well mean only that the master shall extend the time in accordance with the provisions of regulation 57. That argument also fails. For these reasons I think that this appeal must succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree, and I have very little to add. In my judgment the main question turns upon the true construction of the concluding words of the order for taxation. That order provides that it is to be of no effect unless the taxing-master makes his certificate within a month or unless he extends the time for making his certificate. In point of fact the taxing-master has purported to extend the time, and the question is whether he has properly extended it. On the one hand it is contended that these words mean, unless he shall extend the time within the month. In that case the master did not grant the extension within the proper time and the order is of no effect. On the other hand it is said that these words ought to be read as meaning that the master may extend the time in due exercise of any authority or jurisdiction which he may possess. In that case, for the reasons which I shall presently mention, I think that the master did extend the time properly. Of these two constructions I prefer the second. Upon the first construction of the order, read with regulation 57, I do not see any reason why we ought to treat this order as limiting the time within which the extension ought to be made. That being so, it seems to me that regulation 57 does confer on the taxing-master power to extend the time appointed by this order for making the certificate, even though the application for extension is not made until after the expiration of the time appointed. Consequently, I think that the master had jurisdiction to make that extension of time which he did grant. I think that none of the cases cited before us govern the present case. As regards the two cases before North, J., this point was not covered by his decision, and although any observations which he made are entitled to great weight, it does not appear that this particular regulation was referred to in either of those cases. Whistler v. Hancock, and the other cases of that kind, do not apply, because; on the construction which I place upon this order, it is still an effective order, the master only having extended the time. I agree that in this case the court which made the order has not given any direction to the contrary within the meaning of regulation 57. I only wish to add that I agree with everything that has been said by the other members of the court as to the exercise by the taxing-master of his discretion to extend the time in cases of this kind.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. The plaintiff was a shareholder in the Standard Exploration Co. (Limited), and the action was brought against Mr. Whitaker Wright, the chairman of the company, for damages for misrepresentations contained in and the omission of material contracts from the prospectus.

The company was promoted by the London and Globe Finance Corporation, of which the defendant was the managing director.

It was registered on the 11th of February, 1898, with a nominal capital of £1,500,000, divided into shares of £1 each.

The primary object of the company was to acquire for the purposes of amalgamation, the interests of several different mining companies.

In May, 1899, the defendant and the other directors of the company issued to the public a prospectus dated the 12th of May, 1899, stating that the London and Globe Corporation were authorized to offer 500,000 shares in the Standard Co. for subscription at par.

This prospectus contained, inter alia, the following statement: "Share Department.—The directors have established a share department for the acquisition and disposition of shares and debentures in approved mines and other undertakings. In furtherance of this object the directors have already acquired large holdings in various promising companies, including the following: British America, Le Roi, Columbia Kootenay, East Le Roi, West Le Roi, London and Globe, Lake View Consols, Ivanhoe, Great Boulder, Associated Kalgurli, Victorian Gold Estates, International Copper, and others. Taken at this day's market quotations these shares already show a profit more than sufficient to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. on the total capital of this company for the current year."

The prospectus also stated that the company had agreed to acquire the undertakings of various other companies, which were enumerated, including the Austin Friars Syndicate, and that contracts dated the 12th of May, 1899, had been entered into with reference to each of these undertakings, and the prospectus contained a waiver clause as to the contracts therein referred to.

The plaintiff by his statement of claim alleged that the statement headed "Share Department" was untrue, because the company had not in fact acquired any shares in the companies therein mentioned; and, secondly, because, assuming that the shares had been acquired, they could not be realized so as to pay a dividend at the rate mentioned; he also alleged that several other statements in the prospectus were untrue.

The plaintiff also alleged that, contrary to section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, the prospectus omitted to disclose certain material contracts, including (among others) a contract dated the 27th of October, 1898, made between the London and Globe Finance Corporation and the Standard Co., whereby the corporation agreed to transfer to the company 5,000 deferred shares held by the corporation in the Austin Friars Syndicate, and the company agreed to allot to the corporation 40,000 fully paid shares in the company in exchange therefor, and that the 5,000 shares in question were practically worthless.

After receiving a copy of this prospectus, the plaintiff, on the 17th of May, 1899, applied for 600 shares in the company.

These shares were allotted to him and he paid £600 therefor.

The company never did any business and on the 16th of January, 1901, an order was made on a creditor's petition that it should be wound up.

There were practically no assets in the winding up available for the shareholders.

The plaintiff alleged that he had subscribed for the shares on the faith of the prospectus, and that he had suffered damage thereby; but he adduced no evidence specially directed to the question of damage.

The defendant denied the allegations in the statement of claim, and attributed the failure of the company to speculations on the Stock Exchange unconnected with any of the matters referred to in the prospectus.

The statement in the prospectus under the heading "Share Department" as to the amount of profit was not shown to be incorrect to any material extent. The bulk of the profit, however, was attributable to 200,000 shares in the London and Globe Corporation, and the balance almost entirely to 200,000 shares in the British America Co. At the date of the prospectus and at the date of the allotment to the plaintiff, the Standard Co. had not acquired the shares in the London and Globe Corporation, and there was no agreement binding on the London and Globe Corporation to transfer the shares to the company, although it was intended in fact that they should be so transferred. They were in fact transferred to the company on the 27th of May, 1899.

Kekewich, J., found that the plaintiff had subscribed for the 600 shares on the faith of the prospectus as a whole; that several of the representations complained of by the plaintiff, including the statement under the heading "Share Department," were false to the knowledge of the defendant; that the contract of the 27th of October, 1898, was material, and ought to have been disclosed; and that the plaintiff had sufficiently proved damage to justify an inquiry for damages. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff, and directed an inquiry as to damages in the form in Arkwright v. Newbold, 28 W. R. 828, 29 W. R. 455, 17 Ch. D. 301.

The defendant appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Gore-Browne, K.C., and Bonner, for the defendant.—In an action of this kind the plaintiff is bound to say that he has suffered damage. There is no evidence that the shares at the time of their allotment to the plaintiff were of less value than what he gave for them, and the fact that subsequently owing to circumstances which had no connection with the accuracy or inaccuracy of any statements in the prospectus they became valueless is immaterial.

Warrington, K.C., Powell, K.C., and Higgins, for plaintiff.—The statement in the prospectus as to the London and Globe shares having at that time been acquired by the company was untrue in fact. That being so, under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, the onus is on the defendant to show that he had reasonable ground to believe and did believe the statement to be true. The measure of damages is the difference between the amount paid by the plaintiff for his shares and the actual value of the shares at the time of allotment.

COLLINS, M.R., after referring to the constitution and objects of the company, continued as follows: Kekewich, J., has described the transaction which the plaintiff embarked on with his eyes open as a gamble, but he has also come to the conclusion, applying the principle laid down by Lord Halsbury, not for the first time, I think, in Aaron's Reefs (Limited) v. Twiss, that, though the plaintiff had very great difficulty in fastening upon any particular misrepresentation which he could aver had influenced him in taking shares, nevertheless it was a question whether he was misled by the prospectus as a whole, and I think there is quite enough evidence to justify the learned judge in finding, as he has found after seeing the plaintiff in the box, that he was induced to put his money into this concern by representations in the prospectus. The question remains how far those representations were false: and there is a further question whether damage did or did not result, because, in action for fraud, treating this for the moment as an action of fraud at common law, damage is an essential fact in the right of action, and therefore misrepresentation without damage is not actionable; neither is damage without misrepresentation. [His lordship then examined the evidence with reference to the statement as to the acquisition of the London and Globe shares and came to the conclusion that that statement was false. He then continued:] By section 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, the burden of proving that the defendant did honestly believe, and on reasonable grounds, that the statement as to the London and Globe shares was true, was thrown upon him because the evidence pointed to the conclusion that those shares had not been acquired at the date of the prospectus. [His lordship then discussed the defendant's evidence on this point and came to the conclusion that he had not discharged the onus which was cast upon him by the statute. He then dealt with the charge based upon section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and agreed with the learned judge that the charge was well founded, and continued:] Therefore it comes to this, that the one central misrepresentation is that contained in the paragraph as to the share department. There is also the misrepresentation resting upon the statutory provision of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. But still, the plaintiff having established misrepresentation, has to show damage, and therefore I have to go next to the question of whether or not he has shown that he has sustained substantial damage in this case. It was contended very forcibly by the defendant that this is a case in which no substantial damage has been established, because, even conceding that there was any misrepresentation upon which the plaintiff acted, still all such representations were made good within a week or ten days after the issuing of the prospectus, and therefore a man who embarked in a company which in point of fact at the time of the action did not contain all that he had reason to suppose that it would contain in the way of property could not come here and claim damages on the footing that he had lost his money. Of course that raises a very important question. The learned judge has found that there was substantial damage, and if there was evidence upon which he reasonably might find it we should be very reluctant to differ from him. The question, therefore, is whether in the circumstances proved as to the company at the trial there was sufficient evidence of substantial damage to justify the learned judge in coming to his conclusion. In my opinion there was. It was proved that this company went into liquidation and was wound up on the 16th of January, 1901, and practically nothing comes to the plaintiff in the winding up. It was suggested in evidence by Mr. Whitaker Wright that the complete failure of the company and the absence of all assets were due to transactions entirely disconnected with any of the misrepresentations in the case, but it is clear that the learned judge did not give implicit credit to Mr. Whitaker Wright's evidence, and therefore it cannot be treated as established that no part of the complete financial failure of the company was due to any of the matters misrepresented in the prospectus. But apart from that it seems to me that there was evidence of substantial damage sufficient to support the action upon this point which I have called the central point of misrepresentation as to the acquisition of these shares and the profits thereon. Now as to the profit which Mr. Whitaker Wright claimed to have established on the evidence as it now stands, and the result of the learned judge's decision, it was not at at all certain at the time when the prospectus was issued whether the Globe shares would be acquired or not. In point of fact they were not acquired till some time later and therefore at the date when the prospectus was issued there was a misrepresentation, and damages might have been assessed there and then on the date on which this gentleman paid his money on the allotment of shares to him. That is clearly the time at which his damages must be assessed. He had paid his money and he had got in return for it a property which did not contain the 200 000 Globe shares in respect of which a profit of so large an amount is said to have been obtained. Therefore the position is this, and anybody assessing the damages will have to consider it. What is the difference between the value of the property as it was represented and the property without this large asset in it having regard to the possibility, certainly the uncertainty, of that asset ever being in fact acquired. We now know no doubt that it was acquired afterwards, but that is not the material point. The damages have to be ascertained in view of the facts as they were at the time, in view of the central fact that this asset had not been acquired. Whether it could be legally acquired at all might be a question. One would have to consider whether the handing over of such shares from the Globe Corporation by the managing director, Mr. Whitaker Wright, to another company with this profit upon them at a consideration of not the then apparent value of them but the face value of them was a transaction that could have been enforced or not, and whether even if it could be enforced the Globe Corporation had so committed themselves to it as to make it capable of being enforced against them at all; and thirdly, whether if they were not absolutely legally fixed with the obligation of carrying it out they would in point of fact carry it out. All these questions would have to come into consideration, and this might result in a conclusion that it was a matter of so much uncertainty whether these shares would be acquired that the omission to acquire them might be treated as an absolute loss to the assets of the company at the time. At all events it seems to me that there was abundant evidence that the difference between the position of the company with those shares and its position with such prospects as it then had of acquiring them afterwards might be substantial.

That obliges me to say something as to the principle upon which damages are assessed in these cases. There is no doubt about it now. It has been laid down by several judges, and particularly by Cotton, L.J., in Peek v. Derry; but the common sense and principle of the thing is this. It is not an action for breach of contract, and therefore no damages in respect of prospective gains which the person contracting was entitled by his contract to expect come in, but it is an action of tort, it is an action for a wrong done whereby the plaintiff was tricked out of certain money in his pocket, and therefore, primâ facie, the highest limit of his damage is the whole extent of his loss, and that loss is measured by the money which was in his pocket and is now in the pocket of the company. That is the ultimate final highest standard of his loss. But in so far as he has got an equivalent for that money that loss is diminished, and I think in assessing the damages primâ facie the assets as represented are taken to be an equivalent and no more for the money which was paid. So far as the assets are an equivalent he is not damaged, so far as they fall short of being an equivalent in that proportion he is damaged. Here there is strong evidence which the judge has acted on, that there has been a substantial diminution in the equivalent, and therefore that the plaintiff has sustained substantial damage.

Now these things taken together fulfil all the conditions of the action. There must be damage suffered by reason of action taken upon misrepresentation. All these conditions are fulfilled, and therefore, as it seems to me, this judgment must be affirmed, though, as I have pointed out, I do not agree with the learned judge in all his findings of fact. Still, in the result of his decision we agree, and this appeal therefore must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this appeal must be dismissed. I will for brevity refer to the London and Globe Finance Corporation (Limited) as the Globe, and to the Standard Exploration Co. (Limited) as the Standard. Now, it appears to me that there was undoubtedly one statement of a substantial kind in the prospectus issued by the defendant which has been shown to be untrue. I refer to the statement in the prospectus under the head of "Share Department," which stated that the directors had already acquired large holdings in various promising companies, which included the Globe; and that, taken that day at the then market quotations, those shares already showed a profit more than sufficient to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. on the total capital of the company for the current year—that is to say, a profit of £150,000. That allegation in the prospectus was clearly of a substantinl kind, and one which, on the evidence, I come to the conclusion was relied upon by the plaintiff. It appears to me that the untruth of that statement can be shown by a consideration of one item only—namely, the item of 200,000 Globe shares—and, for the purpose of my judgment, I need not deal with the other items, for it is common ground—or at any rate it is not in dispute—that the main profit of £150,000 to which I have referred was based upon the profit supposed to be derived from the 200,000 Globe shares that I have mentioned. If at the date of the prospectus or allotment the company had not acquired those 200,000 Globe shares, the statement I have referred to in the prospectus was clearly untrue. Now, the plaintiff has put in evidence the books of the Globe and of the Standard. The books of the Globe show that these shares were not in fact allotted until the 27th of May—that is to say, a substantial time after the allotment of the shares in the Standard. That entry is of a curious kind. It speaks of the allotment as being in confirmation of some previous allotment, but the books show no prior allotment at all—the prior entries in fact rather negative the existence of any prior allotment to the Standard being possible. They certainly point to no authorization to any person to allot to the Standard. No contract or entry as to or affecting these 200,000 shares is shown, either by the books of the Globe or the books of the Standard prior to the date I have mentioned—namely, the 27th of May. There is nothing whatever in the books of either company which could show a right of any kind whatever to any of these shares on the part of the Standard before the 27th of May. The plaintiff, on that evidence put in by him, established, if there was no evidence sufficient to meet it, that these shares were not acquired at the date of the prospectus or allotment of the Standard shares. The onus was clearly therefore on the defendant to prove, if he could, that the Standard had previously acquired these shares. Now, he gave evidence upon the point, and the account given by him in his evidence in chief to show that the Standard had acquired any right to these shares prior to the 27th of May was to my mind vague, unsatisfactory, and contradictory. I have carefully considered the subsequent evidence, and to my mind the subsequent evidence and cross-examination of the defendant only made it more clearly apparent that this defendant could not establish any right of any kind whatever to these shares on the part of the Standard prior to the 27th of May. There was no other evidence; he was not supported in the vague and contradictory statements to which I have referred by the evidence of any other witness; he was not supported by any documentary evidence; on the contrary, as I have pointed out, such documentary evidence as there is is against him. On this evidence it is clearly the duty of the court to hold that it has been established that, prior to the 27th of May, the Standard had not acquired the Globe shares or any of them. The statement in the prospectus, then, was untrue in fact, and then, under the Directors' Liability Act of 1890, s. 3, if the defendant wished to escape liability for the untrue statement, he would have to prove that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did up to the time of the allotment believe, that the statement was true. On the evidence before us I am satisfied he has not discharged the onus that is cast upon him by the Act of 1890. It follows that, if loss or damage has been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the untrue statement to which I have referred, the defendant is bound to pay compensation to the plaintiff for that loss or damage. Now, the plaintiff, as I have pointed out, took the shares in the Standard on the faith, and because of, that untrue statement, on the faith of the statement being true. If that act of taking these shares caused loss or damage to the plaintiff, then, in the words of the section, in my opinion the defendant is bound to pay compensation for that loss or damage. The question then is, Did the plaintiff suffer loss or damage by reason of his taking the shares in this company by relying upon this statement in the prospectus? In other words, Did he suffer loss or damage because he took these shares? The question then comes to this, having regard to the inquiry directed by the judge, Did the plaintiff, at the trial of this action, sufficiently show some substantial damage in respect of his taking these shares, so as to justify the inquiry directed by the court? On the whole, I think he did. That he had in fact suffered loss or damage at the time he commenced his action is beyond question, in this sense, that the company has been wound up and he has lost his money. But the defendant says, by his evidence, that the winding up of the company and the loss which thereby ensued to the plaintiff was not due to circumstances existing at the date of the allotment of the shares, but solely by reason of circumstances which occurred afterwards—for example, as he says, certain speculation in shares. Again, on that point, his evidence is not corroborated, so far as I am aware, by any other evidence in this case which would justify the court, unless it fully relied upon this gentleman's testimony, in taking his statement as conclusive on the point, and his cross-examination on certain points did not favourably impress me, and I think it appears not to have favourably impressed the judge who tried the case and saw the defendant in the box. But, even assuming in his favour the point he was making by his evidence, and taking it in his favour that the plaintiff has to show from other circumstances beyond the winding up of the company and the loss that thereby ensued, that the shares at the date of the allotment were not worth what he gave for them, I think that the plaintiff on the whole has sufficiently shown this. I take it that when, in a case like this, application is made for shares in a company on a representation stating that company has certain advantages, in the absence of evidence to the contrary it should be taken that the price paid for the shares was equivalent to the value of the shares in the company having the advantages stated in the prospectus. Certainly, as against the plaintiff, although I will assume as against him for this purpose that the money he paid for these shares was met by an equivalent if he had received shares in a company having all the advantages stated in the prospectus, I cannot assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that those shares were worth more than the plaintiff had to pay for them. Then, was there any evidence which would show that at the date of the allotment these shares had, by reason of other advantages beyond those shown in the prospectus, a greater value than the amount the plaintiff had to pay for them? I think not. I certainly, under the circumstances of this case, cannot take the market quotation with regard to these shares for some time after the allotment as showing that the shares had a true value above what was given for them apart from the representations of the company as shown in the prospectus. Nor was there any evidence to show that, apart from deficiency of assets, which would be shown in this company, if the statement as to the £150,000 profit was untrue, it was made good by other advantages in connection with the company not shown by the prospectus or existing in fact. So that, if the £150,000 assets in fact did not exist at the date of this allotment, I take it that, at the date, the shares in this company were not worth what was given for them, because the company had not the £150,000 assets in substance which the prospectus said it had. Now, counsel for the defendant contend that, even if the company had not these shares at the date of the allotment, they acquired them a few days afterwards; and that made the statement perfectly good. I need scarcely point out the fallacy of that contention unless they can establish the risk of not getting these shares which was run by this company—which had not the shares at the date of allotment, and might not have got them—was not substantial. In my opinion that risk was substantial. The question has to be tried by looking at what was the true value of the shares at the date of allotment. To show what was the value of the shares later on, after they had got these 200,000 Globe share, is not the point, nor, indeed, is it relevant to inquire. Because if one went on to inquire what was the condition of the shares some days later, when the 200,000 Globe shares were acquired, one ought also to inquire what were the circumstances in connection with the company at the time, for it would not follow that of necessity, if one could inquire into it, there were not other counterbalancing disadvantages at that latter date. It is irrelevant to inquire into a state of circumstances after the date of allotment—that is to say, to inquire only as to one particular side of the matter. The proper inquiry is: What was the true value of these shares at the date of allotment? As I have pointed out, if the risk run was substantial, as I have said I think it was, then the shares were not worth what they were represented to be worth by the prospectus, which was the price paid for them by the plaintiff. I think, therefore, as the evidence stands, the plaintiff has given evidence sufficient to justify this court in saying that some damage was incurred by him which would justify the court in directing the inquiry as to damages as directed. I should, perhaps, add that there is no evidence before the court that the deficiency of value of the company's property at the date of the allotment in respect of the Globe shares, to which I have referred, was made good or counterbalanced by the value of the other assets at that date of the company. Having regard to the view which I have expressed, it is not necessary for me to deal with the other points which have been argued before us. Some of them have been dealt with by the Master of the Rolls, and I only desire to state that it must not be taken, because I have not dealt with them, that I in any way differ from what the Master of the Rolls has said upon those points.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—In this action the plaintiff claims damages against the defendant by reason of statements and omissions in the prospectus of the Standard Exploration Co. (Limited), on the faith of which prospectus the plaintiff applied for 600 shares, which were allotted to him. The defendant was a director of the Standard Co., and was responsible for the issue of the prospectus. The action is not launched as a common law action of deceit, in which fraud would have to be alleged, and proved, although it may be that the facts proved here would support such an action. It is really based upon the Directors' Liability Act of 1890, and upon section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. Now, the Directors' Liability Act was passed the year after Peek v. Derry had been decided in the House of Lords, and, as it seems to me, for the express purpose of getting rid of the effect of that decision so far, and so far only, as directors and promoters issuing a prospectus on the one hand, and persons taking shares or debentures on the faith of the prospectus on the other hand, are concerned. In that particular case the plaintiff only has to prove (in addition to damage) that a material statement is untrue, and he can maintain an action unless the defendant can establish that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, the statement to be true. In other words, the onus of proof is shifted. Has the plaintiff here proved a material statement in the prospectus to be untrue? [His lordship held, on the evidence, that the statement as to the Globe shares was untrue, and that the defendant had not discharged the onus which rested upon him of establishing that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, the statement to be true, and that that statement was material, and continued:] As to damage, it seems to me that the loss of the London and Globe shares which were stated to be worth more than £75,000 beyond the par value is primâ facie evidence of damage. As a rule of convenience, and indeed almost of necessity, the property which would have been acquired by the company, if all the statements in the prospectus had been correct, must primâ facie be taken to be worth the precise sum paid for the property, neither more nor less. This is the primâ facie presumption, and it is sufficient for the decision of the present case, for no evidence has been adduced by the defendant to rebut the presumption. The learned judge was therefore right in holding that the plaintiff had proved damage, though the precise amount was not gone into at the trial. The inquiry as to damages is correct in form. It is not to the point, it seems to me, to allege that shortly afterwards the Globe shares were allotted. Subsequent events cannot be looked at for this purpose. There was a material risk at the date when the plaintiff acquired his shares, that the statement would not be made good. I am not prepared to assume in favour of Mr. Whitaker Wright that he would make an allotment which would be a breach of his duty as director of the London and Globe. With regard to the omission from the prospectus of any reference to the contract of October, 1898, for the purchase of deferred shares in the Austin Friars Syndicate, I agree with Kekewich, J., that it was a material contract, and ought to have been disclosed by the prospectus, and that section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, applies. In my view, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

Adjourned summons.

The testator, W. A. Cartwright, had first been married in 1849, and by that marriage had had six children. Four of them were still living, among whom were the defendants, Mrs. Pickworth and James Cartwright.

By an indenture of settlement made the 29th of March, 1864, in contemplation of his second marriage, W. A. Cartwright covenanted with his trustees, executors, &c., that in case the second marriage should be solemnized, W. A. Cartwright, in his lifetime, or his executors within six months after his death, should pay to the trustees of the settlement £2,000, and should in the meantime pay interest thereon from the date of the said marriage, and it was declared that the said trustees should stand possessed of the said sum of £2,000 on trust to pay the dividends and income thereof to his wife for her life, and after her death to pay the same to W. A. Cartwright and his assigns during his life, and after the death of the survivor of the said W. A. Cartwright and his said wife in trust as to both capital and income for the children or child of the said intended marriage and the children or child of the said W. A. Cartwright by his former marriage as the said W. A. Cartwright and his said wife should in manner therein mentioned jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment, and so far as such if incomplete should not extend for all and every the children or child of the said W. A. Cartwright by his former marriage who being a son or sons should attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry under that age with the consent of her or their parent or guardian, and to be divided between the said children, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common.

There was issue of the second marriage three sons, one of whom died in infancy, while the remaining two were still living and of full age.

The testator, who died on the 6th of November, 1902, without having paid to the trustees of the settlement £2,000, or any other sum, had, however, on the 2nd and 30th of January, 1873, respectively taken out two policies on his life, each for £1,000, under the provisions of section 10 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870*, and upon each policy there was this recital: "And whereas this policy is effected by the said W. A. Cartwright for the benefit of his wife and children for their separate use in terms of the Married Women's Property Act, s. 10."

Upon the death of the testator a sum of £3 200 (including bonuses) became payable in respect of the policies.

By his will, dated the 17th of April, 1902, the testator gave the residue of his personal estate to his trustees in trust, after payment of his debts, to pay the income to his third wife, who survived him, for her life, and after her death upon trust as well the capital as the income for his children, the defendants, Mrs. C. S Pickworth and the two surviving sons of the second marriage.

In the administration of the estate the defendant, James Cartwright, claimed payment of his share of the sum of £2,000 payable under the covenant in the settlement.

The trustees of the will thereupon took out this summons for the determination of the question.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question for decision is entirely new as regards the authorities, but it is by no means new in substance or in principle. Stated shortly it is this, whether a covenant in a marriage settlement to pay £2,000 to the trustees of the settlement has been satisfied by policies for that sum effected by the covenantor. The amount actually payable under the policies is by accretion of bonuses, considerably more than £2,000, but for the present purpose, I disregard that circumstance, and assume that the £2,000 payable under the covenant and the £2,000 payable under the policies are in substance identical sums. In considering the question whether a covenant of this kind has been "satisfied," for that according to the authorities is a proper form of expression, it must be borne in mind that a man who has covenanted to pay £2,000 or any other sum to the trustees of a settlement can satisfy the obligation of that covenant only by paying that sum to those trustees. He must do what he has covenanted to do, and nothing else can be strictly speaking a satisfaction. But a covenantor may, if he pleases, make a provision which is intended by him to satisfy the covenant, and either because he has so expressed himself, or because it is to be so inferred from surrounding circumstances, he may be held to mean that the beneficiaries under the covenant shall take what he has provided for them instead of that which they would take under the covenant. The result is that a beneficiary is put to his election between the benefit of the covenant and the benefit of the provision; he cannot take both. It is necessary to bear that in mind, because the whole question is one of intention.

I turn now to the covenant. [His lordship here read the terms of the covenant as above set out, and continued.] The life interest given to the settlor would, of course, not be applicable to money coming in after his death, and it is to be observed that the power of appointment is unusual, being only to the husband and wife jointly, and not to the survivor. The settlor, having entered into this covenant, some time afterwards effected two policies under section 10 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, for the benefit of his wife and children. The effect of that is that the wife and children surviving him take as joint tenants. The children would take whether they attained twenty-one or not, and they would take quite irrespectively of any power of appointment. The wife, instead of taking a life interest, takes a share, which might be more or less, in the principal, and a share which might have been much increased by children dying in her lifetime without having severed the joint tenancy. It has been argued that the onus is on those who seek to show that such a provision is not a "satisfaction." Be it so. There could hardly be a greater difference between two provisions than that which exists here. In the one case a joint tenancy between wife and children, without any power of appointment; in the other case a life interest to the wife, with a power of appointment amongst children. It seems to me impossible to conceive that when this gentleman effected these policies he really intended that the children taking under his marriage settlement were to accept what he provided for them under the policies in lieu of what was given to them under the settlement. I therefore hold that this is not a case of satisfaction.

BRITISH ASBESTOS CO. (LIMITED) v. BOYD. (a.)

No. 108 of the articles of a company provided that all acts done at any meeting of the directors, or by any person acting as such director, should, notwithstanding that it should afterwards be discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such director or person acting as aforesaid, or that they or any of them were disqualified, be valid, as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director. It was also provided that two directors should form a quorum, and that a director who accepted or held any office under the company, other than that of managing director, was to vacate office as director.

B., a director of the company, was elected secretary of the company, but subsequently resigned the office. At board meetings, subsequent to the resignation, at which B. and only one director were present, various business was transacted, such as the election of directors.

Held, that the acts done by B. in his capacity of a director were validated by clause 108 in the articles of association.

The British Asbestos Co. was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893.

By the articles of association it was provided that two directors should form a quorum, that the qualification of every director should be the holding of shares of the company up to the nominal amount of £500, and a director who accepted or held any office under the company other than that of managing director was to vacate office as a director.

By article 108 it was provided that all acts done at any meeting of the directors or by any person acting as such director should, notwithstanding that it should afterwards be discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such director or person acting as aforesaid, or that they or any of them were disqualified, be valid as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director.

There were at first three directors of the company, all of whom held the necessary share qualification. At a board meeting held on the 23rd of October, 1902, the secretary of the company was removed from his office, and Boyd, one of the directors, elected in his place and at the same salary. Boyd resigned his office on the 2nd of December.

At another board meeting on the 4th of December, at which Boyd and another director were alone present, a letter was read from the third director resigning his office. At the same meeting Boyd was elected chairman and managing director of the company.

On the 5th of January another board meeting of the two directors was held, when a resolution was passed which purported to elect a third person as a director of the company.

At a general meeting of the company on the 3 d of March a fourth director was elected.

Some of the shareholders now brought an action in the name of the company against Boyd and his fellow-directors, claiming a declaration that the defendants were not directors of the company, and moved for an injunction to restrain them from acting as such.

The motion was treated as the trial of the action, and there was a cross-motion by the defendants to strike out the name of the company as plaintiff.

Upjohn, K.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiffs, contended that all the actions done by the defendants, or some of them, on the 4th of December, 1902, and the 5th of January, 1903, and subsequently, were invalid.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and F. Wright, for the defendants.—The defect, if any, was covered by article 108, and by section 67 of the Companies Act, 1862. The case of Dawson v. African Consolidated Land and Trading Co., 46 W. R. 132, [1898] 1 Ch. 6, was indistinguishable.

FARWELL, J.—The only question that I have to determine in the case is as to the meaning of Art. 108, and section 67 of the Companies Act, 1862, and inasmuch as the article is common form it is of some little importance. In my opinion the words in Art. 108, "notwithstanding that it shall afterwards be discovered that there was some defect," do not limit the validating power of the article to instances where the facts giving rise to a defect are subsequently discovered. It is only necessary that the defect arising out of the facts should be subsequently discovered. The facts in a case like the present necessarily appear on the books of the company, but they did so too in the case of Dawson v. African Consolidated Land, &c., Trading Co., for the transfers there which caused the disqualification of a director were transfers out of his name. Those transfers were in the company's books. It is not, therefore, necessary that the facts should not be known in the sense of not appearing on the face of the company's books. But the knowledge of the defect must not be present to the mind of any person to whom it is material to know it. As stated in Buckley on the Companies Acts, the object of a clause like this, and of the sixty-seventh section of the General Act, is to make the honest acts of de facto directors as good as the honest acts of de jure directors; and although, down to the decision in Dawson v. African Consolidated Land, &c., Trading Co., it was generally supposed that such an article or section only applied as between members of the company and outsiders, and did not apply as between members of the company inter se, or as between members of the company and the company, that decision has stated such a view of the law to be incorrect, and has held the article or section to be of general operation. I think it is decidedly beneficial that it should be so. Therefore, although there may be some slip which has been overlooked if it has been bonâ fide overlooked, the act of the de facto directors are as good as the acts of the de jure directors.

Then the next point is this. It is said that the discovery referred to must be of some defect in the appointment of directors. It is clear that there is no defect in the appointment here. Now the disqualification in the present case is under art. 89 (a), which is as follows: "If he, without the sanction of any general meeting, accept or hold any other office under the company except that of managing director, manager, or trustee." Mr. Boyd accepted the office of secretary, and thereby vacated his office. It has been argued that the word "disqualify" has a technical meaning, and that the disqualification referred to is the ceasing to hold qualification shares. To my mind that is not the case. I think "disqualify" refers back to art. 89, and is used in the general colloquial sense that a director becomes disqualified if he ceases to hold his office, or does some act or suffers something to happen which causes him to vacate his office under art. 89. I think "disqualified" is used in the wide sense, and that therefore the article applies. The result is that on the 5th of January, which was the critical moment, there was a de facto board of directors as to whom there had been no discovery that there was any defect in their appointment. Consequently I hold that the defendants are right and are properly constituted directors.

There was a cross motion to strike out the company's name as plaintiff, and it was agreed that this should be done because by virtue of the above judgment the company was under the control of the defendants.

By section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, if any solicitor knowingly permits his name to be used in an action for the profit of any unqualified person, or does any act to enable an unqualified person to practise as a solicitor, the solicitor "shall and may be" struck off the roll.

Where a solicitor is charged under the above section, and the charge is established,

In re Kelly, 43 W. R. 191, [1895] 1 Q. B. 180, considered and followed.

This was the adjourned hearing of a motion by the Incorporated Law Society calling on the respondent solicitor to show cause why he should not be struck off the rolls for permitting his name to be used by an unqualified person contrary to section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and calling on the unqualified person to show cause why a writ of attachment should not issue against him.

When the matter was first before the court they ordered it to be referred to Master Mellor for further inquiries.

Hollams, for the Incorporated Law Society, read the report, and submitted that the finding of the committee that the respondent solicitor had been guilty of professional misconduct of which he was charged had been proved. Under section 32 the court had no discretion as to the measure of punishment, and if the court decided that the statutory offence had been established it was bound to strike the solicitor off the roll.

J. R. Randolph, for the solicitor, urged that the statute did not take away the general jurisdiction inherent in the court, and that, notwithstanding the terms of the section, the court had a discretionary power to inflict punishment short of striking the solicitor off the rolls. In the case of In re Kelly, 43 W. R. 191, [1895] 1 Q. B. 180, the decision of the court (Pollock, B., and Grantham, J.) was really open to review, for Pollock, B., said: "The word 'shall' clearly would leave no doubt whatever upon the question; the only doubt which can arise is from the introduction of the words 'and may be.'" In that case the solicitor was struck off the roll, but it would seem that if the court had held that a less punishment, in their opinion, would have met the justice of the case, they might have decided otherwise. At any rate that decision is in conflict with In re Grayston, 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 680; In re Sykes, 34 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 285; and the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Lamb, 37 W. R. 665, 23 Q. B. D. 477; and the view there expressed by Cotton, J., who dealt with this question, in his judgment at p. 480.

No one appeared for the unqualified person.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We are of opinion that the solicitor must be struck of the rolls. I think, in reference to the point raised by Mr. Randolph, that Kelly's case is an authority binding upon us. It is an authority of the Divisional Court after the dictum had been expressed by Lopes, L.J., in the case of In re Lamb—the four cases cited by Mr. Randolph being also then before the court. With reference to the two cases in which it had been said the courts did not strike off, but suspended the solicitor, I have considerable doubt whether they were purporting to act under this section, although the section was referred to. I think it is quite possible that the courts were in some of the cases acting under their general jurisdiction to deal with an attorney who is called upon to answer matters of affidavit. In my opinion there is in the present case no discretion; and if a distinction is to be drawn, it must be drawn by a court superior to us in authority.

I should like to say, also, that I think that this is a bad case, because obviously the solicitor has been for a long time colourably pretending to employ a clerk, but has in fact been allowing the clerk to make use of the solicitors name, and to sign the solicitor's name, to earn profit for himself. Therefore, upon the merits, I think that this solicitor should be struck off the rolls, and therefore I decide that it should be so, as well as on the ground of the statute.

WILLS, J.—If it were not for the fact that a discretion has been exercised in one of the cases mentioned, and that there are expressions in the judgments of the members of the Court of Appeal that there is a discretion possible under the words of this statute, I should have thought there could not be two opinions about the meaning of such an expression as "shall and may." I observe that although the members of the council said that under these words there may be a discretion, or there is a discretion, nobody has given any reason for it or has explained why the word "shall" is not obligatory because it is followed by "and may." In my opinion the language of the statute is quite free from doubt.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. There has been a report handed up to the court of the case of In re A. H. S., 63 L. T. Rep. 350, one of the cases referred to by Mr. Randolph, in which Denman, J., discusses this point, at p. 351. The court exercised a discretion in that case in this sense, that they inflicted a minor punishment than the striking off the roll; but I do not think, if you read Denman, J.'s, judgment, that the court did it under this section. What he says is "there are dicta of very learned judges in the Court of Appeal that even if a case be brought within the provisions of section 32, nevertheless the court may deal with the case merely under its general authority over solicitors and administer a minor punishment if in the judgment of the court the case is not one in which it is necessary in the interests of the public to act under section 32." That seems to say that there may be cases in which the court does not think fit to act under the section, but nevertheless it may administer under its general jurisdiction some other punishment.

That may possibly be correct, but in this case there is no other professional misconduct except that which comes within section 32. Then if you act under that section you must strike off the roll. I see that I was counsel in the particular case referred to. I have some sort of recollection that that was the sort of argument which I tried to bring before the court—that they need not act under that section if there was any other course open to them.

The order was that the solicitor should be struck off the roll, and that a writ of attachment should issue against Mark Blinkhorn, the unqualified person, and that they pay the costs of these proceedings and the costs preceding the execution of the writ.

CONSETT URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. CRAWFORD. (a.)

Public health—Nuisance—Power of local authority to enter premises—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 102, 306.

It is not competent for the representatives of a district council exercising powers with regard to nuisances under the Public Health Act, 1875, to enter upon premises and inspect them without first requesting the leave of the owner. They must apply for admission, and if they are refused, obtain an order to admit from the justices under section 102 of the Act.

Appeal by the Consett Urban District Council from the justices of the county of Durham.

The special case set out the following facts:

On the 10th of July, 1902, a notice was served on the respondent, as owner of certain premises, requiring him to abate a nuisance on those premises.

On the 24th of July seven members of the council and two officers of the council, together with the county medical officer of the borough, visited, in accordance with a resolution passed by the council, a large number of properties in the urban district for the purposes of inspection, and on arriving at the respondent's premises, in respect of which the notice to abate a nuisance had been given, they went into his yard, leaving two of the councillors talking together outside. The respondent and his son having come up, the former asked the two councillors if they were making an inspection, and on hearing that they were, and that the councillors and doctor were inside, he pulled the door to, put a padlock on, and locked them out, and thereby prevented the two councillors who were outside from coming on the premises.

The council submitted, on these facts, that the respondent ought to be convicted, under section 306 of the Public Health Act, 1895, of having wilfully obstructed them in the execution of their duty.

The justices dismissed the summons on the ground that the council were trespassers, as they had not asked any person's permission to enter the premises, and that the respondents had not wilfully obstructed them. The proper course, in their opinion, was for the council to apply for an order admitting them to the premises, on the ground that the respondent had refused admission to the two councillors who remained outside.

The council appealed.

Russell, K.C., and Glen, for the appellants.—The evidence distinctly shows that the respondent here obstructed the representatives of the council who, having obtained admission to the premises, were carrying out their duties.

R. I. Simey, for the respondent.—The respondent was within his rights in detaining the councillors and preventing them from trespassing on his property.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I should be sorry to say anything that might be construed as an expression of approval of the respondent's conduct. I regret that anyone should have thought fit to do what this gentleman did out of some feeling that the members of the local board ought not to discharge their duty. But this is a criminal charge, and in order to justify it it must be brought within the words of the statute. I wish therefore to say, speaking for myself, that if we had come to the conclusion, having regard to the words of the statute, that the members of the local authority were duly employed in the execution of their duty, and were wilfully obstructed in the execution of the Act, that different considerations would have arisen. But we have to consider what the rights of the local authority are. They are undoubtedly directed to investigate nuisances, and they ought, in the execution of their duty, to do everything in their power to find out what the nuisances are so as to put a stop to them. The sections of the Act not only impose duties upon the local authority, but give them certain rights when nuisances are discovered. The opening words of section 92 are: "It shall be the duty of the local authority to cause to be made from time to time inspection of their district with a view to ascertain what nuisances exist." It is obvious a great many nuisances might be dealt with without entering on private property, but the necessity of such entry may sometimes occur. Therefore, in addition to the general direction for the inspection of nuisances, the statute gives a right of entry on private property, and by section 102 of the statute it is provided that the local authority shall be permitted to enter premises for the purpose of examining as to the existence of any nuisance. When under this Act a nuisance is ascertained to exist, the local authority or their officers are to be admitted from time to time. Where an order has not been complied with, the local authority are to be admitted from time to time at all reasonable hours into the premises. If admission to the premises for any purpose of this section is refused, any justice may by order require the person having custody of the premises to admit the local authority, and if no person having custody of the premises shall be found, a justice shall, on oath being made to him of that fact, by order under his hand, authorise the local authority to enter. We decided in the Wimbledon Local Board v. Hastings, 87 L. T. Rep. 118. that the right to enter was not absolute in the sense that the justices must make the order, but they may hear the person against whom the order was demanded, and may exercise a discretion as to whether or not it shall be allowed. That seems to me to show that there is no statutory right of entry given in the sense that they are entitled to go upon persons' premises without further proceedings, and I think, therefore, that Mr. Simey is right in saying that where there is a refusal the local authority must get an order before they can enter. The case finds that the councillors and the county medical officers had not asked any person's permission to enter the respondent's premises. I think that if we are to overrule the justices' decision we must find that the councillors having got in in the course of a general inspection, they must be held to have been in under such circumstances that interfering with them was obstructing them in the execution of their statutory duties. I do not think that follows. The justices have come to the conclusion that, although the local authority were then performing a public duty, it was not a discharge of their duty as contemplated by the Act. I do not see my way to differ from them, however much I may disapprove of the respondent's conduct, and this appeal must be therefore dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I share the reluctance to say anything which would encourage conduct of this kind in the future. What appears to me to be a short abstract of the legislation on this subject is that by section 92 of the Act the general duty to cause an inspection to be made falls on the local board or on the district council. They resolved that the inspection should be carried out by the councillors themselves. Therefore, they are entitled to all the rights and duties as created by section 102, which is intended to contain a complete code as to the manner in which the inspection shall be carried out, and as to the things what are to be done in order to give a right of entry upon the premises. Now the section is not quite complete, because it does not in terms provide for the present case. It provides for the case where admission is not refused, and for the case where admission is refused. Under that part of the section it seems to me the power given to the local authority is very considerable, because, apparently, it does not matter by whom a refusal has been made if there has been a refusal in fact. If there has been anyone on the premises, whether he has had authority to do so or not, who refuses them admission, they would be entitled to make use of their compulsory powers of section 102 and go before the magistrates. But this is a case where there has been no opportunity of refusal, because those who were conducting the inspection got in without seeing anybody or meeting anybody who could refuse to admit, and therefore that case is not specifically provided for, and therefore one has to see what is the reasonable construction of the clause. Now it seems to me that it would be a very strange conclusion to arrive at that if a person on the premises gave a refusal the owner or occupier could not be proceeded against and punished under section 306, but they must proceed under section 102 and obtain an order which according to the decision in the Wimbledon case is by no means made as a matter of course, and against whom the person concerned might be able to show very good cause why it should not be made. It would be a strange thing if the occupier, or the person concerned having those rights, where there was an express refusal, should be in a worse position where no opportunity was vouchsafed to him of saying whether he would avail himself of that power or not.

I cannot help thinking that it must have been intended that before any steps could be taken there must be an opportunity of refusal. The case where there is nobody on the premises, or where the person having the custody of the premises cannot be found, is provided for. The argument on behalf of the appellant seems to me to confound the circumstances which are necessary to entitle a person acting in the supposed execution of a duty to notice of action with circumstances which would entitle him to defend any action that has been brought on the ground that he was legally justified in what he did. I think under the circumstances this would have been a case of obstruction if these gentlemen had had a right of entry, and I think it would be very unfortunate if any countenance should be given to the idea that conduct of this kind, when there is a right of entry, would not be obstruction within the meaning of the Act.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think it is clear, when you read section 102 carefully, that the Legislature has deliberately stopped short of giving the local authority the right of entry of their own motion. They may be admitted or they may get an order. The gentlemen were not admitted. They went in of their own motion, and that is not justified by section 102. Consequently they cannot be said to be in in the execution of their duty. The respondent was clearly wrong. He should have requested them to go out, and if they had refused he could have gently put his hand on them under the common law. Instead of that he locked them in. If they had been in in the execution of their duty it would have been clearly obstruction. The difficulty is about their right to go in. As to their right to go out, that is clear.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 276, [1902] 1 K. B. 242) affirmed, with a variation.

These two appeals from orders of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.), reported 50 W. R. 276, [1902] 1 K. B. 242.

The appellant Gordon carried on business in Birmingham as a manufacturer, under the style of Gordon & Munro.

In March, 1899, he discovered that his ledger clerk, Alfred Jones, had, since the beginning of 1895, been in the habit of opening letters addressed to the respondent by his customers, and stealing therefrom cheques made payable to the respondent under his trade name.

Actions for conversion were brought against the appellant banks into which the cheques had been paid by the clerk to his own accounts.

These cheques were taken as divisible into eight classes—(1) Cheques payable to Gordon & Munro or order, not drawn on the appellants, and not crossed when taken by them; (2) one cheque payable to Gordon & Munro or bearer, not drawn on the appellants, and not crossed when taken by them; (3) bankers' drafts, drawn by one of the country branches of the appellants' bank upon the appellants' head office, payable to Gordon & Munro or order, and not crossed when received by the appellants from Jones; (4) crossed cheques drawn on the appellants, and payable to Gordon & Munro or order; (5) crossed cheques marked "Not negotiable," payable to Gordon & Munro or order, and not drawn upon the appellants; (6) crossed cheques payable to Gordon & Munro or order, and not drawn on the appellants (this class comprises the great majority of the cheques); (7) crossed cheques payable to Gordon & Munro or bearer, and not drawn on the appellants; (8) instruments drawn in favour of Gordon & Munro and crossed, payable only upon signature by the payees of a form of receipt at the foot of the instrument, and not drawn upon the appellants.

No question arose on this appeal as to classes 2 and 7, nor as to class 4.

The facts are given at length in the court below, and shortly in the judgments of Lords Macnaghten and Lindley.

Cohen, K.C. (Spencer Bower with him), for the Capital and Counties Bank; Haldane, K.C., and Hugo Young, K.C. (P. G. Henriques with them), for the London, City, and Midland Bank.—The banks are entitled to the protection of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 82. The banks simply collected the cheques for their customer. The Stamp Act, 1853, s. 19, protected bankers who cashed cheques drawn on themselves with a forged endorsement. Charles v. Blackwell, 25 W. R. 472, 2 C. P. D. 151. There being no negligence on the part of the banks distinguishes them from Bissell v. Fox, Cab. & Ell., 395, 33 W. R. Dig. 11. Bankers are not trustees or agents of their customers: Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas., 28; National Bank v. Silke, 39 W. R. 361, [1891] 1 Q. A. T. Lawrance, K.C., and John Leslie, for the respondent.—In the case of the crossed cheques the appellant banks did more than collect. The acts done are other than receiving the proceeds. They, in effect, bought them. They gave immediate credit. It was a receiving for the bankers themselves, and they made the usual charges. There was a complete conversion, which I prove.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am sure I need not trouble the House by recounting in detail the facts of these cases or describing the classes into which, for the sake of convenience, the drafts forming the subject of this litigation have been divided. It will be enough, I think, to remind your lordships that all the drafts now in question were stolen from the respondent Gordon, trading in Birmingham under the style of Gordon & Munro, by a man called Jones, who was Gordon's ledger clerk for about ten years. Jones himself lived in Sparkbrook. Unknown to his employer, he carried on a small business of his own as a coffin-furniture maker in Birmingham. In the name of the firm under which he traded he kept an account with the Birmingham branch of the Capital and Counties Bank, and also with the Sparkbrook branch of the London City and Midland Bank. To one or other of these accounts Jones paid all the drafts which he stole from Gordon, forging the necessary indorsement when the draft was payable to order on demand, as was generally the case. When the fraud was discovered, and Jones had been prosecuted and convicted, Gordon brought an action against each of the two banks for conversion of such of the stolen drafts as could be traced to its hands, with a count in the alternative for money had and received to his use. The actions came on to be tried before Bucknill, J., and a special jury. The only question left to the jury was the question of negligence. The result of the findings of the jury on this point was in favour of the banks. All other questions were reserved for the judge. On the principal matter in controversy Bucknill, J. gave judgment for the banks. This decision, however, was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

The main question, and the one most important as regards amount, related to crossed cheques payable to order on demand drawn on banks other than the bank which was being sued. It is not disputed now that as regards these cheques there can be no defence, unless protection is afforded by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which declares that, "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment.

Now it is admitted that each of the two banks acted in good faith. The suggestion of negligence on their part has been negatived by the findings of the jury. It cannot be denied that Jones was a customer within the meaning of the section. The only question, therefore, is, Did the banks receive payment of these cheques for their customer? If they did, it is obvious that they are relieved from any liability which, perhaps, might otherwise attach to some preliminary action on their part taken in view and anticipation of receiving payment. The section would be nugatory—it would be worse than nugatory—it would be a mere trap, if the immunity conferred in respect of receipt of payment, and in terms confined to such receipt, did not extend to cover every step taken in the ordinary course of business, and intended to lead up to that result. The character in which a bank receives payment of a cheque is, as has been already said in this House, a question of fact. To my mind it would have been more satisfactory if the jury, under proper directions from the judge, had answered this question themselves. It, was, however, withdrawn from their consideration.

The appeal was argued very fully and very ably by the learned counsel for the appellants, and especially by Mr. Cohen. And I must say that I was a good deal impressed by his argument in opening. At first sight there is not much difference between the case of a bank which at once credits a customer with the face value of a cheque paid in to his account, and allows him to draw against his credit balance thus increased, and the case of a bank which, without crediting the customer with the value of a cheque before collection, allows him to over-draw his account in view of the anticipated credit. In each case, it was said, the credit is only provisional, whether entered in the customer's account or not. In each case, it was said, payment when received is received for the customer. And in a sense that is true. Then it was urged with some force that practically the only result of upholding the decision under appeal will be to compel some bankers to keep a double set of books where now one set only is required, and thus to impose upon bankers a good deal of extra and perhaps unnecessary trouble. But the protection conferred by section 82 is conferred only on a banker who receives payment for a customer—that is, who receives payment as a mere agent for collection. It follows, I think, that if bankers do more than act as such agents they are not within the protection of the section. It is well settled that if a banker before collection credits a customer with the face value of a cheque paid into his account, the banker becomes holder for value of the cheque. It is impossible, I think, to say that a banker is merely receiving payment for his customer and a mere agent for collection when he receives payment of a cheque of which he is the holder for value.

So long as a bank has for its customers only persons of position with whose circumstances the manager is fully acquainted, as is not unfrequently the case in country districts, where one bank by arrangement with its competitors has a monopoly, it matters little whether the bank at once credits a customer with the face value of cheques paid into his account or waits until collection. The bank only looks to its own customers. But Parliament may have thought that in the increase of banking business likely to arise in consequence of the legislation with respect to crossed cheques, and the competition sure to follow, it would not be improbable that small accounts might be opened with banks by persons of little or no credit, and that it might be a dangerous thing to extend protection to bankers dealing with crossed cheques in all cases, whether they acted simply as agents for collection or in a different character; or possibly at the time bankers asked for no further protection than that which section 82 purports to confer. However that may be, your lordships have only to construe the language of section 82 in connection with the language of the other sections of the Act bearing on the point.

It seems to me that the decision of the Court of Appeal on this question, which is the main question involved, is perfectly right. In the judgments of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, and especially in the judgment of Collins, M.R., I find the subject dealt with so completely, both as regards the history of the legislation and the principles and decisions applicable to the case, that, speaking for myself, I think it would be a waste of time to do more than say that I accept their view. It appears to me that the Master of the Rolls has accurately summed up the whole case. "The protection afforded by section 82 must," he says, "be limited to that which is necessary for the performance of the duty which by the legislation as to crossed cheques was imposed on bankers. If bankers deal with crossed cheques in the ordinary way in which bankers dealt with cheques before the legislation as to crossed cheques and in which they deal with cheques other than crossed cheques at the present time, namely, by treating them as cash, and upon receipt of them at once crediting the customer with the amount of them in the ordinary way instead of making themselves a mere conduit pipe for conveying the cheque to the bank on which it is drawn, and receiving the money from that bank for their customer, I think they are collecting the money, not merely for their customer, but chiefly for themselves, and therefore are not protected by section 82."

On all other questions that have been raised I agree with the Court of Appeal, except as regards the small drafts of which class 3 is composed. On this point I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Lindley, whose opinion I have had the advantage of reading. It is a very small point, and ought not, I think, to make any difference as regards the costs of the appeal.

Subject, therefore, to a slight variation as regards these drafts, amounting in all to £32 15s. 9d., I move your lordships that the decree be affirmed and the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I agree with the judgments of the Court of Appeal and with the judgments of my noble and learned friends Lord Macnaghten and Lord Lindley.

Lord DAVEY.—I had prepared notes for a judgment of my own, but I have had an opportunity of reading the very full judgment which is about to be delivered by Lord Lindley. I entirely agree with the views he has expressed on this case, and in particular with the view he has expressed on the Stamp Act. I have, therefore, not prepared a judgment of my own, and content myself with saying I agree.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I also have had the pleasure of reading the judgment of Lord Lindley, and I agree with all parts of it.

CAPITAL AND COUNTIES BANK (LIMITED) v. GORDON.

Lord LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal turns entirely on the true construction and effect of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The facts are simple, and not in controversy. Gordon, who traded as Gordon & Munro, was the holder for value of thirty-two crossed cheques, drawn by various persons on various banks and payable to Gordon & Munro or order. Gordon had a clerk named Jones, and he forged endorsements in the name of Gordon & Munro on these cheques, and then took or sent them to the Capital and Counties Bank, where he had an account. Jones also indorsed them in his own name, and the bank credited his account with the amounts, and he drew on his account whilst the amounts of the cheques so paid in stood to his credit. The bank manager dealt in this matter with perfect bona fides, and without negligence, having no suspicion that anything was wrong. He said he held the cheques until he received payment for Jones, and credited his account with the proceeds, and that he received the cheques in the ordinary course of banking business, and that all the cheques were collected for Jones. The bank manager was not cross-examined on these answers; but there is some ambiguity about them. The documents and accounts, however, show exactly what was done, and it is plain that the bank did not wait until the cheques paid in by Jones had been passed through the clearing house before their amounts were placed to his credit. They were placed to his credit when he paid the cheques in; and he was allowed to draw upon his account increased by them as above stated. None of the cheques were ever returned to the bank; they were all duly honoured, and the appellant bank received their amounts in due course from the banks on which they were respectively drawn. Afterwards Jones's frauds were discovered, and he was prosecuted and convicted. Gordon, who had been robbed of the cheques and wrongfully deprived of the money represented by them, brought an action against the bank to recover that money which the bank had received under the circumstances above described.

If this case had to be determined on general principles of English law, apart from statutory enactment, the bank would have had no defence to Gordon's action. Before the Judicature Acts he could have recovered the value of the cheques, either in an action of trover or in an action for money had and received. A long series of well-established authorities, which cannot, I apprehend, be now questioned, establishes the liability of the bank beyond all dispute; nor was this seriously contested by the counsel for the appellants.

But then reliance is placed on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. This section has come before the Courts more than once, and before this House in Great Western Railway v. London & County Bank. Those cases only go to show that a bank is not protected by the section unless—first, the bank acts in good faith, and without negligence; unless, secondly, it receives payment for a customer; and unless, thirdly, the bank only receives such payment. The last paragraph of the section shews that this last condition is as important as the first and second. But the questions in any particular case whether a bank has received payment for a customer, in good faith and without negligence, and whether the bank has only received such payment, are questions of fact depending on the circumstances of each case. The facts of this particular case do not, in my opinion, bring the bank within the operation of the section. What has to be considered is not the cheque, but its payment. Now, when the cheque was paid to the bank, the bank received the payment for itself rather than for Jones. It is no doubt, true that, if the cheque had been dishonoured, Jones would have become liable to reimburse the bank the amount advanced by it to him when it placed the amount to his credit. This he would have had to do whether any cheque, crossed or not, was placed to his credit and was afterwards dishonoured. To this extent and in this sense it may be said that the bank received payment for Jones, because payment of the cheque discharged him from the liability he would have been under to repay the bank the sum placed to his credit if the cheque had not been paid. But what your lordships have to consider is not Jones's liability to the bank if the bank never received payment of the cheque, but for whom did the bank in fact receive such payment. The amount would not be again placed to Jones's credit; it was already there. The bank in its then ignorance of the forgery could not withdraw that credit after it had received payment of the cheque. As between the bank and Jones, the money paid belonged to the bank as soon as the bank received it. The bank had a right to sue for the money and to apply it in any way the bank thought proper, provided only Jones was not treated as owing its amount. It was said by the appellants' counsel, with some confidence, that any jury of business men would find as a fact that the bank received payment of these cheques for Jones, and nothing more. All I can say is that I think it very likely they would do so if left to themselves without proper directions from the judge, but that if proper directions were given them they would not be likely to go wrong. It must never be forgotten that the moment a bank places money to its customer's credit the customer is entitled to draw upon it, unless something occurs to deprive him of that right. Nothing occurred in this case which had any such effect to the knowledge of the bank. It appears to me impossible to say that under these circumstances the bank received payment of the cheques in question for their customer Jones.

Whether it is desirable to alter the wording of section 82 is not for your lordships to consider on the present appeal; but so long as that section stands in its present form, bankers who desire its protection will have to be more cautious, and not place crossed cheques paid in for collection to the credit of their customers before such cheques are paid.

This appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

I pass now to the appeal of LONDON CITY AND MIDLAND BANK v. GORDON.

This appeal raises not only the same question as the last, but also several further questions owing to the forms of the cheques and drafts paid by Jones into the appellant bank. In the respondent's case eight classes of instruments are described; but of these only Nos. 1, 3, 6, and 8 have to be considered by your lordships.

Class 6 is like those which had to be considered in the appeal of the Capital and Counties Bank. It is unnecessary for me to say more about these, for the reasons already given are applicable to them. It may, however, be useful to mention that Jones was required by the London City and Midland Bank to indorse the cheques which he paid into it, and that he frequently availed himself of the credit given him for those cheques by drawing against such credit. The accounts show that this was constantly done, and to a much greater extent than in the case of the Capital and Counties Bank. These additional circumstances cannot in any point of view improve the position of the appellant bank. The decision of the Court of Appeal on this class was, in my opinion, correct.

Class 1 consists of cheques not crossed when taken by the appellant bank. It appears to me that section 82 would be deprived of all meaning if it were held to apply to cheques not crossed when they came to the hands of the bank seeking the protection of that section. Section 77, sub-section 6, does not assist the appellant bank in the present case, although it might be useful if an indorsement were forged after a crossing. As regards this class, I can usefully add nothing to what was said in the court below.

Class 3 presents more difficulty; it consists of four small drafts drawn by a country branch of the appellant bank on its own head office and not crossed. The first question which has to be considered is whether these instruments are bills of exchange as defined in section 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. If they are, then, not being crossed, section 82 will have no application to them, even if that section could have applied in this case to such documents if crossed. But if these drafts are bills of exchange within the meaning of section 3 they will come within section 60, and the bank will be protected by it, for these cheques are drawn on the bank sought to be made liable for paying them. But I agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the bank, which is both drawer and drawee of these instruments, is not entitled to treat them as bills of exchange as defined in section 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act; although a holder may sue the bank upon them and treat them either as bills of exchange or as promissory notes—see section 5, sub-section 2. An instrument on which no action can be brought by the drawer can hardly be a bill of exchange within section 3 of the Act, whatever it may be called in ordinary talk.

Next it was contended that section 17 of the Revenue Act of 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 55) extended to these documents and brought them within the protecting clauses of the Bills of Exchange Act. But, as pointed out by the Court of Appeal, section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1883, only applies to drafts issued by a customer of a bank, whilst these drafts were issued not by a customer, but by a bank to a customer. I agree, therefore, with the Court of Appeal on this point.

But then reliance was placed on the Stamp Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict c. 59), s. 19, which relates to drafts or orders drawn on bankers and payable to order on demand. The section exonerates the bankers drawn upon from liability if they pay such drafts or orders to holders claiming under indorsements which are forged. This statute was passed before crossed cheques were regulated by statute, and it has no special reference to them; nor does it refer to any bankers except those on whom the instruments are drawn.

The history of this section is well known. It was inserted at the instance of Lord Overstone, when cheques to order on demand bearing one penny stamps were first introduced. He saw that these would become common, and would expose bankers to serious risks from forged indorsements; and the section was inserted for their protection. The Stamp Act of 1853, except section 19, has been repealed; but section 19 has been preserved, and in 1872 it was made applicable to documents issued by the Paymaster-General in pursuance of the Court of Chancery Funds Act (see 35 & 36 Vict. c, 44, s. 11). This section, although referred to in the amended points of defence, was apparently overlooked in the court below; at all events, it is not noticed in the judgments delivered by the Court of Appeal. I can, however, find no reason for saying that it does not apply to class 3. In terms it clearly does. Bigham, J., had this point before him in Brown, Brough, & Co. v. National Bank of India, 18 Times L. R. 669, and he decided that in that case the bank was not protected. He did so on the authority of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case now before your lordships; but it is manifest that, had it not been for this authority, the learned judge would have decided the other way. The draft he had to deal with was drawn in Madras on London, and Mr. Grant, in his book on Banking, p. 24, says that section 19 only applies to inland bills. It is unnecessary to consider whether he is right in this respect, as the drafts now under consideration are inland drafts.

I invite your lordships' attention to the fact that section 19 of the Act of 1853 is left unrepealed by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, although section 60 of that Act is evidently taken from section 19 of the Act of 1853, and made applicable to bills of exchange and to cheques, as defined in sections 3 and 73 in the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882. The only conclusion which I can draw from these enactments is that section 19 of the Act of 1853 was purposely left unrepealed in order that it might apply to drafts or orders which did not fall within the definitions of bills of exchange or cheques in the codifying Act of 1882. These definitions are far more limited and scientific than the sweeping descriptions contained in the Stamp Acts; and section 19 of the Act of 1853 appears to me to be purposely preserved in order to protect bankers cashing drafts or orders on them, and which are not bills of exchange or cheques as defined in the Act of 1882, in the same way as section 60 of that Act protects them from cashing documents drawn on them and which are bills of exchange and cheques as defined in it.

As regards these four drafts, therefore, I think there has been an oversight, and that the decision appealed from is wrong.

There remains only class 8—that is, instruments drawn in favour of Gordon & Munro, and crossed, payable only upon signature by the payees of a form of receipt at the foot of the instrument and not drawn upon the appellants. These documents are clearly not bills of exchange within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act. Nor, for reasons already given, are they brought within it by section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1883. Nor do they come within section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1853, which, as I have already observed, applies only to banks which are drawees.

In substance this appeal fails, although, as to a few drafts of comparatively small amounts it succeeds. The result, in my opinion, therefore, is that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed except so far as it relates to the drafts forming class 3, but that as to them the decision should be reversed. This success is, however, too small to affect the costs of the appeal, which should be borne by the appellants.

Appeal from a decision in Court of Appeal, ante, p. 580 (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.), where the facts are given at length. In outline they are as follows: The Secretary of State, acting in pursuance of a contract of 1849, gave notice of his intention to purchase an Indian railway and works for £30,000,000 odd, and, further, gave notice to pay by way of annuities. These annuities were vested in respondents, who claimed return of income tax on so much of the annuities as represented capital repaid, and the Court of Appeal held that income tax was only payable on that part of the instalments which represented interest.

Cripps, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and Tyrrell T. Pain, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I am not satisfied with the very ingenious arguments which have been addressed to your lordships, and am of opinion that the Crown has failed in the contention that this was an "annuity" within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts. I, however, do not mean that the question was free from difficulty, and the presence of the word "annuity" in those Acts gave plausibility to many of the observations of the Attorney-General. Still, looking at the real nature of the transaction, I come to the conclusion that this was not a case of the purchase of an annuity, but one wherein, under the powers reserved by the contract, one of the parties agreed to buy from the other what was the latter's property; and I have no doubt that what was called an annuity in the contract between the parties was really a mode of making payment for that which, by the hypothesis, had become a debt to be paid by the Government. The Income Tax Acts were not intended to tax capital as income, and your lordships are at liberty to analyse the real character of the transaction and to discuss whether this annual sum was partly capital and partly income. Here, then, was an antecedent debt, and I cannot differ from the views expressed by the three judges of the Court of Appeal. If the whole of these annual sums were taxed, there would be a taxation of capital such as was not contemplated by the Legislature. It was not a question upon which one could dogmatize. There were cases no doubt, in which, in a sense, capital was taxed, as for example in the case of rent derived from coals, which was not strictly speaking rent at all. Other illustrations might be given of the same character. The only answer to be given in the case of such anomalies was that income-tax could not be levied on strictly logical lines. But in this case the word "annuity"—the only word which could be relied on by the appellant—was not used in the sense intended by the Income Tax Acts. For these reasons I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lords MACNAGHTEN, SHAND, DAVEY, and LINDLEY concurred.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.) (Vaughan Williams, Romer and Stirling, L.JJ.) June 20.

In re A DEBTOR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Company—Winding up—Liquidator—Judgment for unpaid calls—Set-off Application to set aside bankruptcy notice—When set-off must be effective—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).

To enable an application by a debtor to set aside a bankruptcy notice which has been served on him by a judgment creditor to succeed, the debtor must show that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand which can be set up by him at the time of the application to set aside the bankruptcy notice, and not merely one which can be subsequently set up in the bankruptcy so as to put an end to any effective claim by the judgment creditor for the amount of his judgment. There is no general principle that a bankruptcy notice should not be issued in respect of a debt if on bankruptcy that debt would be discharged by a set-off.

This was an appeal by the debtor from a decision of the registrar in bankruptcy dismissing an application to set aside a bankruptcy notice which had been served on him on behalf of the Prospecting and General Developing Co. of West Australia (Limited).

The debtor was a shareholder in the company, which, on the 13th of September, 1900, passed a resolution for voluntary winding up.

On the 9th of May, 1901, the company recovered judgment against the debtor for £121 1s. 10d. for calls on shares and £8 5s. 2d. costs, making together £129 7s.

This sum not having been paid, the company, on the 20th of April, 1903, served the debtor with a bankruptcy notice.

The debtor had a claim against the company for over £4,000, and he applied to the registrar to have the bankruptcy notice set aside on the ground that this claim was, within section 4 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand, which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The registrar dismissed the application.

The debtor appealed.

Whinney, for the appellant.

Hansell, for the respondent.

The arguments used appear from the judgments.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a case of considerable difficulty. We assume for the purpose of this hearing that there is, as between the company, which has a claim for unpaid calls, and the defendant, who is a shareholder in that company, a claim for moneys due from the company to the defendant which in point of amount would overlap the claim for the calls.

Now this company is in liquidation, and the result of this company being in liquidation is that the statutes in relation to companies—the Companies Acts, 1862—make such provision as to what shall be done in the event of liquidation, that after liquidation the cross-claim by a shareholder, such as the defendant against the company, cannot be set up. The real reason for that is that although the action, even after the liquidation, is an action which is brought in the name of the company, in substance it is brought by the liquidator for the amount which the liquidator may find to be due from, amongst others, shareholders and creditors of the company. The moment you arrive at that conclusion the result is that there is, as expressed by Bramwell, B., in Sankey Brook Coal Co. v. Marsh, 19 W. R. 1012, L. R. 6 Ex. 185, a want of mutuality. He says: "I think that these debts are in substance not mutual, but that the real plaintiff is the liquidator, and that the debt sued for is really due to the body of creditors. In their behalf he brings the action." The result of that would be this, that assuming the claim of the shareholder against the company to overlap the debt for calls, the shareholder could not set up that defence against the liquidator. It is not that a time might arrive presently on the happening of which the defendant would be able to rely upon this set-off; it is that the want of mutuality will form a complete answer to any claim by the defendant to set up this defence against the claim of the liquidator for calls. In this case there has been obtained by the liquidator a judgment in the King's Bench Division for the amount of calls unpaid by the defendant. Of course, no defence by way of set-off or otherwise could be set up against that claim. In that state of things the liquidator has issued a bankruptcy notice under clause (g) of section 4 of the Act of 1883. I had better read that clause. It is amongst the clauses declaring the acts of bankruptcy, and this is one of the acts of bankruptcy which is declared in clause (g). "If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him"—that is against the debtor—"for any amount, and, execution then not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or by leave of the court elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act requiring him to pay the joint debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and he does not, within seven days after service of the notice, in case the service is effected in England, and in case the service is effected elsewhere, then within the time limited in that behalf by the order giving leave to effect the service, either comply with the requirements of the notice or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross demand, which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

There can be no doubt here that the creditor has obtained his final judgment, and there can be no doubt that he has served the bankruptcy notice, and I do not understand that it is suggested in any way that the debtor has complied with the terms of that bankruptcy notice. He has not paid the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment; he has not secured or compounded it to the satisfaction of the creditor or of the court. Under those circumstances the only course which is really open to the debtor, if he wishes to avoid committing this act of bankruptcy, is to get the bankruptcy notice set aside upon grounds which are admissible, having regard to the terms of the section.

Now, what is said by the debtor here is that he has a set-off which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained. Now, it is not disputed—in fact it is common ground—that he could not set up this set-off in the action in which the judgment was obtained. He could not because of the want of mutuality. The debtor says, although he could not do that, yet by virtue of the terms of section 38—a section which takes effect when a receiving order has been obtained, and takes effect from the date of the receiving order—there would be an effective set-off which could be set up against this claim of the judgment debtor, and he says that entitles him to have his bankruptcy notice set aside. He enforces that by saying that the bankruptcy notice is a first step in bankruptcy, and also by saying that by the very terms of the provisions of the 7th section of this Act, when the petition for a receiving order comes on to be heard, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would not make an order for a receiving order if they found that there really was such a set-off to this debt which could be set up in the administration in bankruptcy, and which would put an end to any effective claim by the judgment creditor for the amount of the judgment. What we have to consider is, whether that claim by the debtor can be well founded. In my judgment the question whether that contention by the debtor can be supported depends upon the terms of the 4th section, clause (g), which I have already read. Has the debtor here satisfied us that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained? And, as to the latter part, there is no doubt he could not set it up. Then, has he a counterclaim, set-off, or cross demand? One must ask oneself at what point of time. It is quite plain—indeed it is common ground—that at the time when the action was brought and the judgment was obtained that he had not a set-off equalling the judgment debt. To what time do these words "he has" refer? It seems to me that those words must refer to the time of the hearing of the application to set aside the bankruptcy notice. Then has he a set-off at that moment? He clearly has not a set-off in respect of which at that moment he could bring an action, for, as is pointed out by Bramwell, B., in the judgment to which I have already referred, it is plain that the defendant could not maintain an action against the company for this cross-claim—that is to say, he has not at that moment, when the application is made to set aside the judgment summons, an effective set-off which he could enforce at that moment. What does this section mean? Does it mean that at that moment he must have an effective set-off which he could enforce by action, or is it sufficient that he has vested in him a right of set-off at that moment which, when the proper time comes in bankruptcy, could be used for the purpose either of reducing or wiping-out this judgment debt?

Now, he has the latter, but he has not the former, and we have to answer the question whether it is sufficient that he has the latter—that is to say, a right of set-off which is existing but can only be effectively used after the making of the receiving order in the administration in bankruptcy or under the receiving order, which is the same thing. Now, not without considerable doubt, I have come to the conclusion that the words here refer to a set-off which can be enforced at the moment of the hearing of the application to set aside the bankruptcy notice. It must be remembered that the persons who are claiming the judgment debt at that moment are the creditors as represented by the liquidator, and nothing has happened since the judgment to prevent them having that character. At the moment of the hearing of the application to dismiss the bankruptcy notice these creditors, as represented by the liquidator, are making no claims upon the basis of the judgment debt in any bankruptcy administration. It is quite possible that there never may be a petition founded on this act of bankruptcy either by the plaintiffs, the judgment creditors, or by anyone else, for this is an act of bankruptcy which any creditor can take advantage of as a basis for a petition for a receiving order, and it is also quite possible that even if there is is a petition there may be no order for a receiving order. It seems to me that the meaning which I have put upon these words is pointed to by the words at the end of the clause—"which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained."

In this particular case it is true that he cannot set up the set-off because of this want of mutuality, but it is possible that you might find a defendant who, through carelessness, or for some other reason personal to himself, did not care to set up the set off. Now we will take that case, and we will suppose that he had got a set-off and could, if he had chosen, have relied upon it as a defence to the action. Judgment is obtained against him without reference to that set-off. A bankruptcy notice is issued. Could you set aside that bankruptcy notice? Clearly not if you have regard to the words "and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained." The Act of Parliament expressly prevents his relying upon a set off as a ground for setting aside the bankruptcy notice in a case in which he could have set it up but did not.

But all these arguments based upon the bankruptcy—based upon the fact that there could be a set-off in the event of the bankruptcy under the 38th section—would apply just as much to the case where the debtor neglected to set up a set-off which he could have set up as they do to a case where there was a set-off which he could not rely upon. It is perfectly plain that the result of failing to set up the set-off which might have been set up does not satisfy the debt upon which the set-off is based; on the contrary, if there is a receiving order made, and there is an action taken under the mutual credit clause in bankruptcy, although the debtor has not chosen to set up the set-off in the action, the creditor would have to give credit for the set-off when it comes to proof of a debt on the action taken under the mutual credit section. And that is quite right, for this reason. If it were not so it would be doing great injustice to the body of creditors, because you have a fund upon which the body of creditors are entitled to come, and you would, by reason of the neglect of the debtor to set up his set-off, enable someone to rank upon that fund who, as against creditors, has no right to rank upon it.

Under those circumstances it seems to me that we ought to construe this section as meaning an effective counter-claim, set-off, or cross-demand at the time of the hearing of the application to dismiss the bankruptcy notice.

The only other matter that I think I need refer to at all is the suggestion that in the event of a receiving order there will be relation back of the title of the trustee, or whoever may be the representative of the creditors, up to the time of committing this act of bankruptcy by non-compliance with the bankruptcy notice. But it seems to me that the answer to that is the same answer that I have just given to the other points which were brought forward in this case—that is to say, that it goes too far. If it is true, it would just as much cover the case where there is neglect to set up the set-off as a case where he could not set up the set-off, and this makes it obvious that he is not to be allowed to set aside the bankruptcy notice where the set-off is one which the debtor could have set up but has neglected to do so.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that this appeal fails, and it must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that the appeal fails. This case cannot be dealt with on the footing that what the creditor has done in issuing the bankruptcy notice was an abuse of the process of the court. There is nothing in this case to show any want of bad faith on the part of the liquidator. Indeed, bad faith has not been suggested, nor has the question as to abuse of the process of the court been gone into at all, or been considered by the registrar. In fact, there appears, as I understand, to be a dispute between the parties as to whether or not the set-off claimed on behalf of the debtor does or does not equal the amount of the judgment debt; and if there was, as there well might be here, a bonâ fide opinion on the part of the liqudator that the set-off was not equal to the amount of the judgment debt, he is well entitled to issue his bankruptcy notice and to have that question determined, and, if determined in his favour, to be able to proceed to further bankruptcy proceedings and obtain an adjudication.

It appears to me, therefore, that the grounds of the application by the liquidator being an abuse of the process of the court cannot, under the circumstances of the case, be established or even urged before us. Then I proceed to consider whether the appellant can succeed on any other ground, and I am bound to say I can find no satisfactory ground on which to allow the appeal, although personally I should have been very disposed, if I could have seen my way, to have supported by my judgment the position of the appellant. But at the time when this bankruptcy notice was issued, and at the time when the application to discharge it came before the registrar, it is clear that, the judgment debt being one for calls in the winding up of the company, no set-off could be urged by the debtor in respect of a debt due to him from the company, because, having regard to the provision in the Companies Act, 1862, in substance, unless and until bankruptcy supervenes, the two debts give different rights. The debt due for calls, though nominally due to the company, is really not so much a debt due to the company as being a liability to contribute to the assets. The rights of the creditors of the company have supervened, and they have rights beyond what the company would have had against this debtor if there had been no winding up. It is true that if bankruptcy of the debtor ensued there would be a right of set-off, and the reason is that the right of the creditors of the bankrupt in that case have supervened, and you have to deal with the difficulty that there is a double right—namely, the rights of the creditors of the company and the rights of the creditors of the bankrupt, and those rights are equal, and the only way of dealing with the difficulty in that case is to treat the mutual rights as if they were the old rights of the debtor in his individual capacity, and the company in its individual capacity, and so the right of set-off must be enforced and accrues. It is said that the principle of there being no right of set-off by a debtor in such a case as this until bankruptcy supervenes would prevent the Court of Bankruptcy from refusing adjudication on a petition presented by the liquidator in respect of the debt due to the company. The answer to that is this: The court has a judicial discretion as to whether it will or will not adjudicate a man bankrupt on a creditor's petition, and I think that in such a case a case of the kind we have to deal with here—in ordinary circumstances the court would, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse to make the man bankrupt on the petition of the liquidator, because the very fact of an order being made adjudicating a man bankrupt at the instance of the liquidator would destroy the cause—the right of set-off to accrue—and so destroy the position of the petitioning creditor. I was trying to see whether it could be said that there is a general principle that a bankruptcy notice should not be issued in respect of a debt if on bankruptcy that would be discharged by a set-off. I should have been glad if I could have found such a principle available for us in this case, but it appears to me that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act prevent us saying there is any such principle. If you look at the words of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act this is clear—that it contemplates that a bankruptcy notice may be issued by a person who has obtained judgment against a debtor for a debt even if that debtor has a set-off of equal or greater amount but had not pleaded it in the action in which the judgment was obtained. In that case it is clear that adjudication could not be made at the instance of the creditor who had obtained, the judgment, and that the Act clearly contemplates that, notwithstanding that fact, he could issue a bankruptcy notice in respect of his judgment debt. I cannot therefore find the existence of the principle which would enable the appellant to succeed in this case, and in the absence of some principle, and in the absence of any legitimate ground on which I could enable the appellant to say he is entitled to discharge this bankruptcy notice, I regret to say I think the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with the usual consequences.

STERLING, L.J.—I have felt great difficulty in arriving at the conclusion to which my learned brothers have come, and with which I agree.

The reasons for my conclusion have already been given by both my learned brethren, and I feel I cannot usefully add to them and I do not want therefore to express any further opinion.

Application for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Walton, J., and a jury at Liverpool.

The plaintiff, Philip Preist, carried on business as a draper and the defendant was a retail chemist. Preist went to the defendant's shop and asked for an indiarubber hot-water bottle for the use of his wife, who was suffering from cramp. The defendant showed him two indiarubber bottles, one being larger than the other, and Preist selected the smaller one. The defendant did not himself manufacture indiarubber hot-water bottles, but bought them from a wholesale dealer. According to the defendant's evidence Preist asked him if it would stand boiling water, and the defendant replied that it would not, but that it would stand hot water. Preist thereupon purchased the bottle and paid the defendant 3s. 6d. for it. His wife used the bottle for a few nights, when it burst and she was severely scalded. Preist and his wife brought this action, Mrs. Preist claiming to recover damages for personal injuries owing to the alleged negligence of the defendant, and Mr. Preist claiming to recover damages for breach of warranty.

Walton, J., left certain questions to the jury which, with their answers, were as follows: (1) Was Mr. Preist, when he brought the bottle, told by the defendant that it was fit for use with boiling water?—No. (2) Was the bottle, when sold, fit for use as a hot-water bottle?—No. (3) If it was not fit for use, was that the cause of the bottle bursting?—Yes. (4) Was there any negligence on the part of the defendant in selling this bottle for the purpose for which it was sold?—The jury were unable to agree upon this question. (5) What damages?—£40 for expenses incurred by Mr. Preist, and £100 compensation for Mrs. Preist's pain and suffering.

It was agreed that any questions of fact bearing on the question whether there was an implied warranty and not covered by the findings of the jury should be decided by the learned judge.

By section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows: (1) Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of a seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that, in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose."

Walton, J., on further consideration, delivered the following judgment: In this case the plaintiffs, Philip Preist and his wife, sued the defendant for damages for negligence and for breach of warranty. The plaintiff Mrs. Preist is the wife of the plaintiff Philip Preist, and their complaint against the defendant is that the defendant, being a chemist, sold to the plaintiff a hot-water bottle which was not fit for use as a hot-water bottle at the time it was sold, and that in consequence, whilst an attempt was being made to use it as a hot-water bottle, it burst, and Mrs. Preist was very seriously scalded, and considerable expense was incurred in medically treating her, and there is no doubt that she did suffer very seriously and was made very ill for a long time by the effect of the scalding. In answer to questions which I put to the jury they have found that the bottle when sold was not fit for use as a hot-water bottle, and that this was the cause of its bursting. I asked them whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in selling the bottle for use as a hot-water bottle, and the jury have not been able to agree upon an answer to that question. As to the damages, they assessed them at £40 for the expenses incurred, and for the pain and suffering of Mrs. Preist at £100. It was admitted at the trial that the bottle was sold by the defendant to the plaintiff as a hot-water bottle for use as such. Upon that admission and these findings the question is, what judgment ought to be entered. The question as to the £100 which the jury have assessed as damages for pain and suffering is quite a different question from that as to the £40, which the jury have assessed as to the damages in respect of expenses. The £100 was the damage to Mrs. Preist only, and it is said that that cannot be recovered in the absence of the finding of negligence, and, there being no contract between the defendant and Mrs. Preist for the sale of the bottle, that Mrs. Preist cannot recover for a breach of warranty. Mr. Preist bought the bottle, and he may be entitled to recover as on a breach of warranty, but his claim must be limited to the expense to which he has been put—namely, the £40, and he cannot recover damages for what his wife has suffered. There is no finding of negligence, and there is no evidence of any contract between Mrs. Preist and the defendant. The case of Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 671, seems to me to be directly in point. I can find no evidence of any contract between Mrs. Preist and the defendant. It is true that Mr. Preist, using ordinary language, bought the hot-water bottle for his wife, that is to say, he bought the bottle because his wife required one, but still it was he who bought it, and the contract was between him and the defendant, and he was not acting as agent for his wife. He bought it on his own account. Therefore as to the £100 I think that the plaintiffs fail.

Now, as to the £40, a totally different question arises. It is said that there was an implied warranty in the circumstances that the bottle when sold was fit for use as a hot-water bottle. It was agreed at the trial that, if there were any questions of fact which were not exactly covered by the answers of the jury to the questions I put to them, and which it was necessary to determine in order to decide the rights of the parties in respect of the breach of warranty, they were to be dealt with by me. The bottle was bought as a hot-water bottle by that description. It was asked for as a hot-water bottle and supplied as such. It was either expressly or by implication purchased and sold for use as a hot-water bottle.

Now, the law applicable to a question of this kind is to be found in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It is not necessary now to look back to the old cases unless the terms of the Act are in some way obscure, and then, in order to understand what the Act means, it may be necessary to look back to the cases. It is extremely difficult to reconcile all the old cases, and I do not think it possible to recognise all the old dicta. Lord Herschell said with reference to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which was also a codifying Act, that the proper course is in the first instance to examine the language of the Act, and to ask what is its natural meaning uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start by inquiring how the law previously stood and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view. I have myself heard Lord Herschell say the same thing in other cases, and it applies to the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as well as to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Sections 13 and 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, are the material sections. By section 13—"where there is a contract for the sale of goods by description there is an implied condition that the goods shall correspond with the description, and if the sale be by sample as well as by description it is not sufficient that the bulk of the goods correspond with the sample if the goods do not also correspond with the description." I should say that that is generally more applicable to the sale of goods which are not ascertained rather than to the sale of a specific chattel. I am not saying that it may not apply to the sale of a particular chattel, but I think it applies more naturally to the sale of unascertained goods. Section 14 is as follows: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any statute in that behalf, there is no implied warranty as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale, except as follows: (1) Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that, in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any purpose." It has not been contended that that proviso applies to the present case, but it does show plainly enough this—that the exception applies just as much to the sale of a specified article as an article which is not specified. The second exception is this: "(2) Where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not) there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of a merchantable quality, provided that, if the buyer has examined the goods, there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed." The important exception is the first. Does the present case fall within section 14, sub-section 1? It is admitted that the buyer did make known to the seller that he wanted the hot-water bottle for use as a hot-water bottle. It is said that this is not a "particular purpose" within the meaning of the section, and that those words apply to something more specific than the use of the article by a particular person. I think that would be limiting the meaning of the sub-section too much. I think that within the meaning of this sub-section a bottle which is required for use as a hot-water bottle is a bottle which is required for a particular purpose, and therefore I think that the case comes within those words in the sub-section. The buyer expressly or by implication did make known to the seller that the bottle was required for a particular purpose. But it must be "so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment." Now, if there is a question of fact involved in that I should find that in this case the buyer, who was a draper, had no particular knowledge of hot-water bottles when he went to the shop of the chemist, who made it part of his business to supply the public with hot-water bottles. I have no hesitation in finding as a fact that the buyer told the chemist he required a bottle for use as a hot-water bottle, and that he did it in such a way as to show that he relied on the skill or judgment of the seller. I think that when people go to a shop which deals with these articles they are entitled to expect that some skill or judgment has been exercised by the shopkeeper in selecting these goods, so that when a person buys something which the shopkeeper professes to sell he may expect to get a thing which is of some use for the purpose for which it is sold and not mere rubbish. To that extent it seems to me that when in a case like this the plaintiff asked at the chemist's shop for a bottle for use as a hot-water bottle he did it in such a way as to show that he relied on the seller's skill or judgment. Undoubtedly the bottle was of a description which it was in the course of the seller's business to supply. It seems to me that all the conditions of the sub-section are fulfilled, and therefore there was an implied condition that the goods should be fit for the purpose. It is asked whether anyone could expect such skill or judgment on the part of a shopkeeper as would enable him to be sure that a hot-water bottle was fit for its purpose. That may be true, but one must remember that where a case comes within the sub-section, the warranty which is implied goes a long way beyond the range of any skill or judgment which the buyer can be supposed to rely on, because the warranty is an implied warranty that the goods are reasonably fit for the purpose for which they are acquired, and not merely that the seller has exercised all reasonable skill or judgment that they shall be fit. Therefore the degree to which the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment is not the measure of the warranty. If the buyer tells the seller what he wants, and that he wants it for a particular purpose so as to show that he relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the seller sells the article, then the seller, unless he takes care to protect himself by some express words, warrants that the article is reasonably fit for that purpose. That is made very plain by Lord Esher in Randall v. Newson, 25 W. R. 313, 2 Q. B. D. 102. I only refer to that case as an illustration. He says, which is practically what the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, says, citing Best, C.J.: "If a man sells generally he undertakes that the article sold is fit for some purpose; if he sells for a particular purpose he undertakes that it shall be fit for that particular purpose. Nothing can be more clear than that the rule is advisedly enunciated as a warranty without limitation." All that applies equally to section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Then he says later on: "If the article or commodity to be delivered does not in fact answer the description of it in the contract, it does not do so more or less because the defect in it is patent, or latent, or discoverable." I think that there was reliance by the buyer on the seller's skill or judgment in this case within the meaning of the sub-section, and that therefore there must be judgment for the plaintiff, Mr. Preist, for £40.

The defendant applied for judgment or a new trial.

Horridge, K.C., and A. P. Thomas, for the defendant.—There being no finding of negligence on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff can only succeed if he shows a breach of an implied warranty under section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. That section has not altered the old law upon the subject; it has merely re-stated it: Brown v. Edgington, 2 Man. & Gr. 279. Where the purchaser buys a specific chattel across the counter, having an opportunity of inspecting it, there is no implied warranty of fitness for any particular purpose: Parkinson v. Lee, 2 East, 314; Bluett v. Osborne, 1 Stark. N. P. 384; Shepherd v. Pybus, 3 Man. & Gr. 868, at p. 881; Emmerton v. Mathews, 10 W. R. 346, 7 H. & N. 586; Smith v. Baker, 40 L. T. Rep. 261, 27 W. R. Dig. 228. Where a purchaser buys a specific article there is no warranty implied from the fact that there is a well-known mercantile article of that kind. Asking for a hot-water bottle is merely a mode of describing an article well-known in commerce. The plaintiff got a hot-water bottle, but not one of good quality. In order to imply a warranty in such a case some fact must be proved or some statement shown to have been made to the seller beyond the mere asking for a hot-water bottle: Barr v. Gibson, 3 M. & W. 390, at p. 399. In Jones v. Just, 16 W. R. 643, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197, there was no opportunity of inspecting the article before the sale. There was no "particular purpose" made known to the defendant at the time of the sale. The plaintiff merely asked for a hot-water bottle. In Wallis v. Russell, [1902] 2 Ir. R. 585, the plaintiff asked for "nice fresh crabs for tea," and the Court of Appeal in Ireland held that the crabs were bought for a "particular purpose" made known to the seller, within section 14, sub-section 1. There was, therefore, no implied warranty, and the defendant is entitled to judgment. They also referred to Josling v. Kingsford, 11 W. R. 377, 13 C. B. N. S. 447; Smith v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 1059, L. R. 6 Q. B. 597; Randall v. Newson; Ward v. Hobbs, 26 W. R. 151, 3 Q. B. D. 150; 27 W. R. 114, 4 App. Cas. 13; Varley v. Whipp, 48 W. R. 363, [1900] 1 Q. B. 513; Clarke v. Army and Navy Co-operative Society, [1903] 1 K. B. 155; Wren v. Holt, ante, p. 435, [1903] 1 K. B. 610.

W. F. Taylor, K.C., and F. A. Greer, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—I should be content, if there were nothing more, to say that I entirely agree with the judgment of Walton, J. But in deference to an argument which has been addressed to us I think it right to deal with it, so as to show that I have appreciated it. The action is brought by the purchaser of an indiarubber hot-water bottle against the seller, claiming damages upon the ground that while his wife was using it as a hot-water bottle, the bottle burst and his wife was severely scalded; and the purchaser contends that the seller is liable for breach of an implied warranty that the bottle was fit for the particular purpose for which it was bought, in other words, for failure to comply with the contract.

The plaintiff, who is a draper, and who may reasonably be assumed to have no special skill or knowledge in regard to hot-water bottles, went to the shop of the defendant, who is a chemist, and asked for an indiarubber hot-water bottle. The learned judge, who had power to draw inferences of fact, has drawn the inference that the bottle was bought and sold for the particular purpose of use as a hot-water bottle. It is said that in the case of a specified article it cannot be said that the article is sold for a particular purpose so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment within the meaning of section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, unless some fact is proved beyond the mere purchase and sale of the specified article.

It was argued that, as the purpose for which the bottle was sold was the ordinary purpose for use as a hot-water bottle, it was not sold for a "particular purpose" within the meaning of section 14, sub-section 1, of the Act. In my opinion that contention is not sound. The object of introducing those words into the section, having regard to the existing state of the law, seems to me to have been this: The goods might have in themselves no special efficacy for any one particular purpose, but might be fit for a multitude of purposes, and if goods of that kind are sold, and the purchaser alleges that he purchased them for a particular purpose, he must show that he made known to the seller that the goods were required for that particular purpose. That would make them goods sold for a particular purpose within the meaning of the section. But if the sale is a sale of goods which by their description are primâ facie capable of being used for one purpose only, then the sale is primâ facie a sale of goods for a particular purpose within the meaning of the section The learned judge, having power to draw inferences of fact, drew the necessary inference of fact here. A draper, who was in these matters an unskilled person, went to the shop of a chemist and asked him for a hot-water bottle. That was a request which when accepted gave rise to a contract to supply a chattel which was capable of being used for the particular purpose for which a hot-water bottle is ordinarily used, that is to say, as a bottle which is capable of containing hot-water for the purpose of being applied to some part of the human body. There was therefore in this case the sale of a specific chattel for a particular purpose, and the circumstances under which the purchase was made showed that the buyer relied on the seller's skill or judgment. That is an inference of fact to be drawn from all the facts of the case, and that inference ought not to be excluded because the article was sold simply as a hot-water bottle. In my opinion the judgment of the learned judge, which is really exhaustive of the case, is correct and should be affirmed. The case comes within section 14, sub-section 1, of the Act, which seems to me merely to express the law as it existed before the Act.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the question is ultimately a question of fact, and that the findings of the jury and the inferences of fact drawn by the learned judge are conclusive against the defendant. The jury have found that the bottle when sold was not fit for use as a hot-water bottle, and that this was the cause of its bursting; and the learned judge has found that the plaintiff, who had no particular knowledge of hot-water bottles, went to the shop of the defendant, who was a chemist, and conveyed to his mind that he wanted a hot-water bottle for a particular purpose, so as to show that he relied on the defendant's skill or judgment. The defendant, in his evidence, said that the plaintiff asked for a hot-water bottle, stating that he wanted it for a special purpose, and he asked the defendant if it would hold boiling water. The defendant said it would not, but that it would stand hot water. In my opinion the learned judge had ample ground for finding that the bottle was sold for a particular purpose within the meaning of section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add.

In re RILEY'S (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Creditors of company — Debenture-holders —Scheme for composition—Agreement—Registration —Deed of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), ss. 4, 5, 7, 8, 16.

The Deed of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), does not apply to limited liability companies, and consequently an agreement by a limited company for composition with its creditors is not void for want of registration. In a case where most of the creditors who had notice had signed or assented to an agreement by a company for a composition, it was held, under the circumstances of the case, that all creditors, who desired so to do, were at liberty to take the benefit of the agreement.

Summons.

This was a summons to determine what persons were entitled to certain moneys in the hands of the applicant, a trustee under an agreement bearing date the 4th of June, 1902.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

Riley's Co. (Limited), was a company limited by shares under the Companies Act. The company being pressed by certain creditors, a scheme was drawn up by a Mr. Harper, the applicant, for adjusting difficulties, and this scheme was placed by him before certain creditors at a meeting, and heads of agreement were signed to the effect that the company should pay the whole of the claim by three equal instalments, and for this purpose to pay into a banking account to be opened in the name of the applicant a weekly sum of £24, until enough should have been paid to meet all the said claims with interest thereon at the rate thereafter mentioned. At the end of three months Harper was to pay the money to the creditors pro ratâ; proceedings by the creditors against the company were to be stayed, and goods supplied were to be paid for in cash; if the company made default in any weekly payment the agreement was to be at an end, and the rights of the creditors were to revive. The company sealed the agreement, which was executed in duplicate. Harper knew at the time of the existence of other creditors whose debts amounted to £933 10s. 4d. in the aggregate, most of whom signed or assented to the agreement. Practically all the creditors who had notice signed or assented, but there were creditors who had no notice. The company paid to Harper £216 by weekly payments.

On the 10th of August, 1902, the company made default in payment of the further instalments due under the said agreement, and nothing further had since been paid.

On the 29th of October, 1902, Mr. Whamond was appointed receiver and manager of the company in a debenture-holder's action.

The claims of the creditors, other than those who signed or assented to the agreement, amounted to £2,500.

The question arose whether the creditors who had signed or assented, the creditors who had not signed or assented, or the receiver for the debenture-holders, were entitled to receive the money paid under the agreement.

The books showed that the company was insolvent at the date of the agreement.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Whinney, for a creditor who had signed the agreement, and Harper.—The amounts paid to Harper would have equalled the debts of the creditors who signed or assented to the agreement, and Harper was their agent. The agreement was not void within the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, for want of registration. The Act does not apply, nor do the Bills of Sale Acts apply, to limited companies: In re Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627.

A. Whittaker, for debenture-holders.—The question is whether the agreement is void for want of registration. If it is not void, it enures for the benefit of all creditors: Latter v. White, L. R. 5 H. L. 578, 21 W. R. Dig. 209; General Furnishing and Upholstering Co. v. Venn, 11 W. R. 756, 2 H. & C. 153. The debenture-holders have a right to share in it with creditors, but do not insist on their right.

J. G. Wood, for creditors who had not signed.—The agreement is good, but it was made for the benefit of all creditors and all ought to share.

Whinney, replied.

BYRNE, J.—The first question is whether the agreement is void for want of registration under the Act of 1887, and that turns on whether the Act applies to deeds executed by limited companies. The Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, belongs to the class of legislation having reference to the bankruptcy laws. After the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which exempts in certain cases authorised composition deeds, statutory composition did not exist, and in that state of circumstances the position became peculiar that composition deeds shou'd only be executed outside the jurisdiction of this court, and a good deal of the winding up of the estates of bankrupts was carried out through private hands without any interference from the legal authorities. Then in 1887 a new Deeds of Arrangement Act was passed. Prior to this, the Companies Act of 1862 had already dealt with the question of deeds of arrangement by companies. By section 164 of that Act it is provided that "any conversion or assignment made by any company formed under the Act of all its estate, and effects for the benefit of all its creditors, shall be void to all intents." When one examines the Act of 1887 he cannot fail to be impressed by this, that the various expressions used seem to be referrable to arrangements by individuals, rather than by arrangements by limited companies. That this document may be a deed of arrangement within the Act is admitted. The definition clause (section 7, sub-section 2) provides that a deed of arrangement shall include instruments made by "a debtor for the benefit of his creditors generally" (otherwise than in pursuance of the law for the time being in force relating to bankruptcy), and "cases where creditors of a debtor obtain any control over his property or business are provided for." By section 5 unregistered deeds of arrangement are avoided. Section 6 provides the mode of registration. It directs that a true copy of the deed shall be filed with the registrar in like manner as in a bill of sale, "together with an affidavit signifying the time of execution and containing a description of residence and occupation of the debtor and of the place or places where his business is carried on, and an affidavit by the debtor stating the total estimated amount of property and liabilites included in the deed, the total amount of the composition (if any) payable thereunder, and the names and addresses of his creditors." The residence and occupation of the debtor have to be described, and an affidavit must be filed by him that none of these things are applicable to limited liability companies. By section 7 the registrar is to keep a register where shall be entered (1) "The name, address, and description of the debtor, and the place and places where his business is carried on, the title of the company or firm under which the debtor carries on business, and the name and address of the firm, if any, under the deed," and (2) "The amount of property and liabilities included in the deed as estimated by the debtor." By section 8 the registrar of bills of sale is to be registrar for the purposes of the Act. Section 9 speaks of the "name, residence, and description of any person" which would include those of the debtor. Section 16 is as follows: "The third sub-section, paragraph (g) of the 28th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, enacts, amongst other things, that one of the facts on proof of which the court shall either refuse an order of discharge to a bankrupt or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time, or grant the bankrupt an order of discharge, subject to the conditions mentioned in the section, is that the bankrupt has on any previous occasion made a statutory composition or arrangement with his creditors shall be read and construed with the word statutory omitted therefrom. That section has the effect of bringing deeds of execution under the Act of 1887 within the scope of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Now section 17 says that nothing in the Act is to affect the provisions of the law of bankruptcy, and section 18 gives the power to make rules. The interpretation section of this Act contains no definition of the word "debtor," but it defines persons as including any "body of persons" corporate or incorporate. In the interpretation clause of the rules I find "debtor" is defined as "any person by, for, or in respect of whose affairs a deed of arrangement, as defined by the Act, shall be made or entered into, and includes a firm of persons in "co-partnership." Sub-clause 3 provides that "any terms and expressions defined by the Act shall in these rules have the meaning assigned to them by the Act." Mr. Whittaker says that I must look back to the Act to find out what "person" means; that I shall then find that it means a body of persons corporate or incorporate; that that definition includes a a company, and therefore that by the rules debtor includes a company. That is his strongest point, but I do not think it is sufficient to do away with the inferences I have already referred to. The form given in the appendix to the rules cannot apply to companies, and by rule 10 "The county court registrar shall keep an index alphabetically arranged in which he shall enter under the first letter of the surname of the debtor such surname, with his own name, address, and description." There is another clause of the Act which I need not refer to, section 13, by which, where the place of business of the debtor is situate outside the London bankruptcy district, the registrar is to transmit a copy of the deed to the registrar of the county court in the district in which the place of business is situate, with an affidavit in the form given in the appendix to the rule and that is not suitable to companies. From first to last, looking at these provisions, and bearing in mind that there have been two lines of legislation, one dealing with bankruptcy and the other with companies, and the facts which led to the passing of the Act of 1887, all tending to show that what was dealt with by that Act were deeds executed by those who, under the Act of 1869, came under the bankruptcy law, I am led to the conclusion that the Act of 1887 was not intended to, and does not, apply to deeds of arrangement by limited companies. Coming then to the agreement itself, so far as the debenture-holders are concerned, it was contended that the deed was invalid, and it was admitted that they could not at the same time claim to come in under it; or, rather, their right to do so was not insisted on. There is the body of creditors whose names were given to Mr. Harper, and also the outside creditors, who claim to take advantage of the agreement. The argument on behalf of the latter was put in this way: It was said that a deed or agreement in this form was meant or adapted to include all creditors who desired to take the benefit of it, and was not confined to those whose names appeared in the schedule to the agreement as having assented to it. One of the arguments addressed to me with the object of restricting the effect of the agreement as much as possible was this, that if the company paid up their instalments of £24 a week for three quarters of a year the sum produced would just about equal the amount required to pay off the creditors whose names were given to Mr. Harper, but to my mind that is an argument against confining the scope of the deed to the creditors actually named in the schedule. General Furnishing and Upholstering Co. v. Venn, 2 H. & C. 153, was cited, in which the deed was not exactly in this form. It was a deed, and it was held to be for the benefit of all those willing to accept the composition. I cannot see any substantial distinction between the document in this case and that deed for the purpose of confining its benefit to those who chose to come in under it. In my opinion, therefore, all the creditors who like to take advantage of the deed are entitled to share in the £216.

KAUFMAN v. GERSON AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Conflict of laws—" Lex loci contractus "—Contract made according to the laws of the country of the contract, and intended to be performed there—Invalid in England—Right to enforce such contract in England.

K., the plaintiff, handed to one Emile Gerson, the husband of the defendant, in France a sum of money to be used in buying skins to be dressed and sold for their joint benefit. Gerson appropriated part of the money to his own use, instead of applying it to buy skins. His conduct was criminal in France, and plaintiff threatened a prosecution. In order to avoid a prosecution the defendant, by an agreement in writing made in France, agreed to pay to the plaintiff by instalments out of her own money the amount of the defalcation on the express terms of the plaintiff abstaining from prosecuting. This agreement was intended to be governed by the French law and to be wholly performed in France. By the French law this agreement was not invalid. The defendant being temporarily resident in England, and having property here, action was brought against her here to recover instalments due and payable under the agreement.

Held, that the contract, being valid by the law of the country in which it was made and intended to be performed, though invalid in England as being contrary to public policy, was enforceable here.

This was a case tried before Wright, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff's claim was against the defendant, Emile Gerson, as principal, and against the defendant, Augusta Gerson, as surety for £152 18s. 8d., the balance of £654 10s. 3d., money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant, Emile Gerson, for the payment of which said sum of £654 10s. 3d. the defendant, Augusta Gerson, became security for the said Emile Gerson.

The plaintiff also claimed against the defendant, Emile Gerson, the further sum of £134 9s. 1d. as a further advance.

Judgment was signed against the defendant Emile Gerson.

The defendant, Augusta Gerson, wife of aforesaid defendant, entered a defence joining issue. For the alternative she alleged that in 1897 Emile Gerson was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £2,954 10s. 3d. for monies advanced by the plaintiff to him; that at an interview in Paris in the same year, at which were present the plaintiff and both defendants, the plaintiff represented to her that Emile Gerson had, by failing to apply the moneys lent to him for the specific purpose for which they had been lent, rendered himself liable to a criminal prosecution for embezzlement, and that it was the intention of the plaintiff to prosecute him unless she would pay him £300 in part discharge of the indebtedness, and sign the guarantee now sued upon as surety for Emile Gerson; that at the said interview it was agreed between the plaintiff and herself that in consideration of her paying the said sum of £300 and signing the said guarantee the plaintiff would abandon criminal proceedings against her husband, and she alleged that she made the agreement only under pressure of the said threats and in fear for the safety of her husband and the honour of her family. She further alleged that the above representations were false to the knowledge of the plaintiff, and that they were made by him for the purpose of inducing, and did in fact induce, her to pay the £300 and to sign the guarantee.

By way of counterclaim the defendant claimed repayment of the £300, delivery up of the guarantee, and repayment of all further sums paid by her under the guarantee.

By his reply and defence to the counterclaim the plaintiff alleged that the agreement and guarantee and payment of money were made and done in France, and were governed by the law of such country, and that under such law the transaction was valid, and that the payments made by the defendant could not be recovered back either in England or France.

The further facts, and the arguments of counsel, sufficiently appear in the judgment.

May 9.—WRIGHT, J., read the following judgment: The question to be determined in this case, as it stands at present, is whether the courts of this country ought to enforce a contract made and intended to be performed in a foreign country and according to the laws of that country, the contract being valid and enforceable in and according to those laws, but such that, if it were an English contract, the courts of this country would refuse to enforce it on the grounds of public policy or of undue influence. The question is, of course, not novel, but the authorities leave room for argument as to their application in this case. The facts are, in brief, these. The plaintiff, Kaufman, in France, placed in the hands of Gerson, as a friend whom he wished to assist, a sum of money to be used in buying skins to be dressed and sold for their joint benefit. Gerson appropriated part of the money to his own use instead of applying it in buying skins. His conduct was criminal in France and a prosecution was threatened. In order to avoid a prosecution and protect the good name of Gerson's children, his wife, the present defendant, under the influence of Kaufman's threat, and at his instance, agreed in writing to make good by instalments out of her own property the amount of the defalcation on the express terms that there should be no prosecution on the part of Kaufman. This agreement was made in France, and it was intended by the parties to be governed by French law and to be wholly performed in France. The defendant was English by birth, her husband a German by birth; both were at the time of the agreement domiciled in France. According to the uncontradicted evidence of the single witness called as an expert in French law, and to some authorities which he cited, the agreement was not invalidated in France either on the ground of the compromise of a criminal charge or on the ground of oppression or undue influence, or on the ground of want or illegality of consideration. And for the purpose of to-day I must accept that evidence. The wife being now resident in England, and having property here, this action is brought against her to recover instalments due and payable under her agreement. It is contended on her behalf that the consideration for the agreement is, according to English law, illegal, and contrary to public policy, and that the agreement was obtained by means of undue influence and threats, and therefore ought not to be enforced in this court. The fraud of Gerson was not, in my opinion, of such a kind as to have been in this country the subject of an indictment for larceny at the time when it was committed, which was before the commencement of the Larceny Act for amending the law of larceny (1 Edw. 7, c. 10). Gerson did not obtain the money by any trespass or trick. He was bound to account for the money, but he was not a bailee of it. There was plainly not embezzlement. Nor was there such agency or proof of a direction in writing as would have satisfied sections 75-9 of the Larceny Act, 1861. I will, however, assume that the fraud would have been criminal if committed in England, or that the English rule against agreements in compromise of crime may extend to cases of frauds criminal by foreign laws. At any rate, on the evidence, the duress or influence was, I think, such as would by English law have vitiated the agreement.

The contract having been made in France by parties domiciled there, who intended it to be wholly performed in France and according to French law, it must be primâ facie taken to be governed by French law, and, it being taken to be valid by that law, the courts of this country will entertain an action upon it and will give such effect as they can give to the rights of the parties, as those rights are ascertained by French law, unless the defendant can show that the case is within one or other of certain exceptions, the general nature of which is well defined and most of which are not applicable in this case. To use the language of Chitty, J., in In re Missouri Steamship Co., 37 W. R. 696, 42 Ch. D. 321, at p. 325, the contract is not impeached on the ground that it is "of a criminal or wicked or immoral nature, or such as ought not to be permitted according to the law of civilized countries." It is not impeached on the ground that the enforcement of the contract would be injurious to any public interest of this country. It is impeached principally on the ground that such a contract for the stifling or compromise of a threatened criminal prosecution is contrary to the views of public policy which the courts of this country hold ought to prevail within the limits of their jurisdiction; and it is argued that a foreign contract can never be enforced here if it be a contract which on any ground could not be validly made here for performance here. There are no doubt expressions in some of the text-books, and dicta in some of the cases, which are wide enough to cover such a proposition. But I know of no actual decision which supports it, and it appears to be inconsistent with the decision in several cases, the most important of which is Santos v. Illidge, 7 W. R. 669, 6 C. B. N. S. 841, and 8 W. R. 705, 8 C. B. N. S. 861, where it was held in the Exchequer Chamber that an action could be maintained in this country upon a contract made and intended to be wholly performed in Brazil, and valid in that country, for the sale of slaves to be employed there, and this although the defendants were British subjects resident and domiciled here, and would have committed a felony if they had made the contract here for performance in the Queen's dominions. The point argued and expressly decided was whether the Slave Trade Acts in force at the date of the contract prohibited British subjects from engaging in slave trade in civilized countries in which the trade was lawful by the local law; but the negative of the general proposition maintained by the defendant is necessarily implied in the judgment. So in Quarrier v. Colston, 1 Ph. 147, Lord Lyndhurst had held (before 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109) that an action might be maintained here on a contract made even between British subjects in France for the repayment of money lent for gambling, the contract being valid there. And in Robinson v. Bland, 1 W. Bl. 256, Lord Mansfield seems to have been of the same opinion as regarded contracts intended to be performed in the country where they are made. And in Biggs v. Lawrence, 3 T. R. 454, Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowp. 341, was approved, in which it was held that an action would lie upon a contract made by foreigners in Guernsey for a sale to be completed there of spirits which the parties knew were to be smuggled into England. Lastly, in In re Missouri Steamship Co., in the Court of Appeal, in the converse case of a contract void in the country where it was made, on grounds of public policy as there established, but legal where the performance was to be, the court acted on the principle that it must discover from all the circumstances by what law the parties meant, or must be taken to have meant, the contract to be governed, and must give effect to its provisions accordingly, unless those provisions are contrary to morality or positive law. Against these authorities the defendant relies on Grell v. Levy, 12 W. R. 378, 16 C. B. N. S. 73, and Hope v. Hope, 5 W. R. 387, 8 De G. M. & G. 731, to which may be added Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351. The doubt expressed by Wilmot, J., in Robinson v. Bland, appears to refer to contracts of a plainly immoral kind, as for prostitution. Grell v. Levy is plainly distinguishable on the ground that the contract, which was champertous, was to be performed here; and even so the court thought it important to observe that the plaintiff was an attorney and officer of the court. So in Rousillon v. Rousillon the actual decision was that the agreement was not open to the objection of its being in undue restraint of trade according to our law, and the dictum of Fry, J., that if it had been obnoxious to that objection an action upon it could not have been maintained here, is fairly referable to the fact that it was sought in the action to restrain the defendant from trading in this country, so that the agreement was considered as an agreement to be performed here. The actual decision in Hope v. Hope may be explained in the same way, since the agreement, specific performance of which was sought, was partly for payments to be made by a husband to his wife in consideration of her agreeing to facilitate a divorce in this country, and partly for depriving the husband of the control of his infant children. The dictum, however, of Turner, L.J., is, perhaps, not fairly capable of this explanation. He is reported to have said: "I think that when the courts of one country are called upon to enforce contracts entered into in another country the question to be considered is not merely whether the contract sought to be enforced is valid according to the laws of the country in which it was entered into, but whether it is consistent with the laws and policy of the country in which it is sought to be enforced. A contract may be good by the law of another country, but if it be in breach, fraud, or evasion of the law of this country, or contrary to its policy, the court of this country cannot, as I conceive, be called upon to enforce it." This opinion, if intended to be understood as applying to contracts intended to be performed in the country where they are made, and are valid as well as to contracts which are to be performed here, appears to be inconsistent with Santos v. Illidge and Quarrier v. Colston, and with the principle on which In re The Missouri Steamship Co. was decided, and I am bound to follow those decisions on this point. The second ground on which the contract in the present case is impeached is that it was obtained by the undue influence or duress of a threat to prosecute the husband for crime. If this objection is to be regarded as based on considerations of public policy, the same answer applies as in the case of the first objection. It seems, however, to be more in the nature of an objection to the proof of consent of the defendant to the contract, a consent induced by duress or undue influence being by English law treated as no consent. If this be the correct view it would seem that the law of the country in which the contract is made and is to be performed and the parties are domiciled ought to prevail, unless there is such duress as must be considered to avoid the contract under any but unreasonable and uncivilized institutions of law—a description which would be applicable to such a case as that of consent obtained, e g., by physical torture or by the use of drugs, but, which cannot properly be applied to this case. If these views are correct, it follows that the counterclaim for return of moneys already paid under the agreement fails. And, even if the court ought to refuse its aid to the plaintiff, it would not follow that the counterclaim ought to be allowed. When a contract, made and intended to be performed in France, and, according to French law and valid under that law, has been partly performed there, I cannot see any ground upon which a court in this country can undo what has been legally and properly done according to the law of the country in which it had to be done. I have so far dealt with the case on the assumption that the law in France is as stated by the only witness examined on that point, but inasmuch as that evidence was somewhat slender, and the defendants' counsel thought they were safe in relying on the law of this country as laid down in several text-books, and by Turner, L.J., in Hope v. Hope, and therefore thought the French law immaterial, it is, I think, right to give them an opportunity to show by evidence that the contract was not valid in France. If they desire to do that, they may do so on Friday next on the terms of paying, in any event, the costs of the further hearing, and such other costs (if any) as I may then direct. If notice to that effect is not given by the defendants before Wednesday, I shall, on application, give judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and counterclaim. If notice is so given, there will be no judgment until I have heard the further evidence.

Judgment was subsequently entered for the plaintiff.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HOLDEN. (a.)

Revenue—Estate duty—Gift of personal property—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2, sub-section 1 (c).

In pursuance of a bargain made between the father of the defendant, who was shortly about to marry, and the father of the intended bride, the latter agreed to settle the sum of £20,000 on his daughter on condition that the former would give his son the sum of £10,000. This sum was accordingly given to the defendant by his father, the marriage settlement was executed, and the marriage was subsequently solemnized. Within twelve months of the date of his gift to his son the father died.

Held, that there had been a gift of the £10 000, and that estate duty under section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, 1894, was payable by the defendant in respect of it.

Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99, and Attorney-General v. Johnson, ante, p. 487, [1903] 1 K. B. 617, followed.

Information by the Attorney-General, claiming, on behalf of the Crown, estate duty under section 2, sub-section 1 (c) of the Finance Act, 1894.

The facts as stated in the information were as follows:

By an indenture dated the 27th of January, 1900, and made between the defendant, Wilfred Millington Holden of the first part, Herbert Byng Paget of the second part, Beatrice Mary Byng Paget one of the daughters of the said Herbert Byng Paget of the third part, and Miles Atkinson Sleigh Walter Noel Harris and Arthur Fawcett of the fourth part, reciting (as the fact was) that a marriage was intended shortly to be solemnized between the said Wilfred Millington Holden and Beatrice Mary Byng Paget, and reciting that upon the treaty for the said intended marriage it was agreed that such settlement should be made as was thereinafter expressed, and reciting that the said Herbert Byng Paget had before the execution of the now stating indenture transferred the stocks, funds, shares and securities mentioned in the schedule thereto into the names of the said Miles Atkinson Sleigh, Walter Noel Harris, and Arthur Fawcett, it was by the now stating indenture (expressed to be made in consideration of the said intended marriage) declared that the said parties of the fourth part should stand possessed thereof from and after the solemnization of the said marriage upon the trusts thereinafter contained, being usual trusts of the wife's fortune for the benefit of the intended husband and wife and the issue of the marriage and otherwise as in the said indenture mentioned.

The securities specified in the schedule to the last-mentioned indenture were certain sums of India Stock and Colonial Stocks amounting in value in the whole to upwards of £20,000.

Upon the treaty for the said marriage the bride's father, the said Herbert Byng Paget, agreed to settle the aforesaid personal property on condition that the defendant's father, Henry Holden, should give to his son, the defendant, £10,000, and accordingly, on the 2nd of January, 1900, the said Henry Holden's bankers, Samuel Smith & Co., by his directions, transferred £10,000 belonging to him from his account to that of his son, the defendant.

The marriage took place shortly after the execution of the indenture of the 27th of January, 1900.

The said Henry Holden died on the 1st of February, 1900.

Under the circumstances aforesaid, estate duty under the provisions of the Finance Act became payable in respect of the said sum of £10,000, and the executors of the said Henry Holden brought in an account of the £10,000 on which estate duty was assessed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the 20th of August, 1901, at £650 with interest to that date of £30 0s. 5d. The rate of duty payable is 6½ per cent., the £10,000 being aggregable with other property passing on the death of the said Henry Holden.

The defendant, Wilfred Mullington Holden, on being applied to by the executors of the said Henry Holden for the request necessary under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 6 (2) to authorize them to pay the said duty, refused to do so, contending that no such duty was payable.

The information prayed that it might be declared that upon the death of Henry Holden estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, sub-section 1 (c) upon the said sum of £10,000 given by him to the defendant less than twelve calendar months before his death, as property passing on the death of the said Henry Holden.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (Vaughan Hawkins, with him), for the Crown.—Estate duty is payable under section 2, sub-section 1 (c) of the Finance Act, 1894. Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99, and Attorney-General v. Johnson, ante, p. 487, [1903] 1 K. B. 617, are authorities which support this claim. The whole question here is whether there has been an immediate gift inter vivos of the £10,000 to the defendant by his father; and it is submitted on behalf of the Crown there was clearly a gift of this sum by the father to his son on the latter's marriage. If that contention be right, then, as the father died within a year of making such gift, estate duty is payable under the Act of 1894. Section 2, sub-section 1, of that Act enacts that—"Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following; that is to say: . . . (c) Property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section thirty-eight of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section eleven of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if these sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily,' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom." This transaction is none the less a gift because it was made in pursuance of the marriage arrangement. The following cases were also referred to: Crossman v. Reg. 35 W. R. 303, 18 Q. B. D. 256; Attorney-General v. Ellis, 44 W. R. 13, [1895] 2 Q. B. 466; and Wheeler v. Humphreys, 47 W. R. 17, [1898] A. C. 506.

C. A. Russell, K.C. (H. S. Simmons, with him), for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable to pay duty on this sum. This transaction was not a gift; it lacks the nature of a bounty which is essential to a gift. The money was paid in pursuance of a bargain made with the bride's father that he would make a settlement on his daughter. The cases quoted on behalf of the Crown are distinguishable from the present case.

RIDLEY, J.—The question in this case is whether the £10,000 was a gift within the meaning of section 2, sub-section (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894. The case of Attorney-General v. Worrall, which was before the above Act had come into force, was decided upon section 11, sub-section 1 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), which amended section 38, sub-section 2 of the Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12). The point argued in that case was whether the transaction there amounted to a gift within the meaning of section 11, sub-section 1 of the Act of 1889. In that case certain hereditaments had been mortgaged to the defendant's father to secure a loan. By a subsequent deed made between the defendant's father, the mortgagors, and the defendant himself, in consideration of a sum of money paid by the defendant to the mortgagors, and in further consideration of the defendant covenanting to pay to his father an annuity during his lifetime, the mortgagors and the defendant's father conveyed the hereditaments discharged from the mortgage debt to the defendant. The Court of Appeal held that that transaction was a gift of the mortgage debt to the defendant. Lord Esher, M.R., there said: "I think that it comes within section 11, sub-section 1, of the Amending Statute of 1889. It was, in my opinion, a 'gift' within that enactment. I have already said that what was given was the mortgage debt, which was personal property. Also, I think that the possession of the property was not assumed and retained by the donee 'to the entire exclusion of any benefit to the donor by contract or otherwise.' It appears to me that the covenant by the son to pay an annuity to the father prevented this from being a pure and simple gift, and, therefore, it comes within the Statutes." Yet the transaction in that case was a gift, though it was not a pure and simple gift. That case was followed by Attorney-General v. Johnson, which was a case of somewhat the same nature, although there was introduced the question of a testamentary disposition.

Counsel for the defendant endeavoured to distinguish both those cases from the present one. Firstly, he says, because the principle of a testamentary disposition appears to have influenced the mind of the court in Attorney-General v. Johnson, whereas here it does not exist. It is quite true that a testamentary disposition is referred to by Vaughan Williams, L.J., when delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, but one cannot help seeing that the real ratio decidendi in that case was in support of the reasoning in the case of Attorney-General v. Worrall. The learned lord justice refers to the object of the statute, and states that in Attorney-General v. Johnson it was a gift of a testamentary nature. I cannot, however, accept the argument that that was the real decision of the court, which, it seems to me, was based on the principle laid down in Attorney-General v. Worrall. The other distinction taken by counsel is that here the transaction only comes within that part of the section which deals with gifts not made twelve months before the death of the deceased donor, and that, therefore, the reasoning employed by the court in deciding the question under the latter part of section 11, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1889 does not apply. It is true that it does not in this same direct way apply; but I think that the reasoning does apply in order to see whether this was a gift or not. It does follow, therefore, that the fact that there could be anything given in exchange, or covenanted or agreed to be given in exchange by the donee, does not prevent the transaction from being a gift if you can see, from the nature of it and from considering the source of the matter and the reason why it was entered into at all, that it was intended as a gift. In Attorney-General v. Worrall that was the nature of the transaction; so, too, I think it is here. If a man says: "My daughter is going to be married to your son; I will settle so much on her if you will give your son £10,000," and then the father of the intended bridegroom gives the £10,000 to his son, I think that is a gift, and if so, it is within the principle of the decision in Attorney-General v. Worrall. This transaction is of that nature. There was no obligation which existed under which the father was bound to pay the son the £10,000, but he made a gift of it to him in exchange for which he received nothing. So far this case, compared with that of Attorney-General v. Worrall, is an à fortiori case. Though the father of the bridegroom received nothing, nevertheless his daughter-in-law received a settlement upon her. It appears to me that by parity of reasoning with the case of Attorney-General v. Worrall that fact must be regarded as not preventing what the father-in-law had done from being a gift.

It might indeed make it not a pure and simple gift; yet in this case I think it was a pure and simple gift because the consideration did not proceed to the defendant's father. However that may be, I am unable to find that there is anything to distinguish this case from the former decisions.

I therefore think the judgment must be for the Crown.

"THE MANAR." (a.)

Ship—Mortgage—Action in foreign country—Staying proceedings in this country for declaration as to priorities—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, r. 5.

On default being made under a mortgage of a British ship, the mortgagees, the plaintiffs, took possession and chartered her to a port in France, where she and her freight were arrested by the defendants, who were British subjects and who claimed for necessaries supplied the ship, and judgment by default being obtained in England was made "executory" in France. The mortgagees intervened in France, and also commenced separate actions against them and against the mortgagors asking for judgment, declaring that they, as mortgagees in possession, were entitled to the ship and her freight in priority to the mortgagors and to the defendant's claiming for necessaries.

The Court held that the action against the defendants, who claimed for necessaries, was not vexatious, and ought not to be stayed; but that the action against the mortgagors ought to be stayed.

Brooking v. Maudslay, Son, & Field, 36 W. R. 664, 38 Ch. D. 636, followed.

The plaintiffs were the Northern Trust (Limited).

The first defendants The Manar Steamship Co. (Limited).

The second defendants, Messrs. Strachan Bros.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The main issue raised was the question of priorities as between the plaintiffs, as mortgagees of the steamship The Manar, and the second defendants Messrs. Strachan Bros., ship chandlers, who had supplied necessaries to the ship.

The immediate question which the court had to consider was raised by both defendants applying by motion under ord. 25, r. 5, to stay actions brought by the plaintiff seeking declaratory judgments as to their rights in The Manar and her freight in the circumstances following.

The Manar is a steel screw steamship of 2,562 tons gross, built in 1892, and owned by The Manar Steamship Co. (Limited), a corporation dating from the 13th of January, 1900.

On the 26th of June of that year, the company registered a statutory first mortgage of the ship for £17,000, with interest at 7 per cent. to the plaintiffs, as a collateral security, they being the trustees for debenture holders.

The mortgagors made default in payment of principal and interest, and in March, 1902, the plaintiffs took the necessary steps to obtain possession of the vessel, giving notice to the master and the charterers of the ship, and on the expiration of her then charter the plaintiffs chartered her to a Peruvian firm to load a cargo of phosphates from Banfort, in South Carolina, for St. Nazaire, France, and on the 5th of May steps were taken to voluntarily wind up The Manar Steamship Co.

On the ship's arrival at St. Nazaire the consignees took delivery of the cargo and became liable for freight, and on the 10th of June the defendants, Messrs. Strachan Bros., ship chandlers of Newcastle, took proceedings at St. Nazaire as creditors of the owners for necessaries supplied to the vessel while in the United Kingdom and at New York, and they arrested the vessel for 19,500 francs, being the balance due on such account.

The French court directed the plaintiffs through the master of the vessel to give bail for 25,000 francs to answer that claim, and directed Messrs. Strachan Bros., to give bail to the master for 20,000 francs to meet a claim for damages in case it should thereafter transpire that the arrest was wrongful.

On the 21st of June Messrs. Strachan Bros., obtained judgment by default in the King's Bench Division in England for £759 10s. 9d. against the mortgagors, the freight having already been attached by the master of the vessel and by the Barry Graving Dock and Engineering Co. in respect of a claim for repairs to the ship.

The mortgage was afterwards made executory in France and the English judgment, obtained by Messrs. Strachan Bros. also became executory, and their attachment of the freight, and also the plaintiff's mortgage, were declared valid.

On the 2nd of December the plaintiffs commenced proceedings at St. Nazaire for a declaration of the validity of the arrest of freight by Messrs. Strachan Bros. to be set aside, and for a declaration that they had no rights over the vessel and for judgment in the same, and for an order directing the consignees of the cargo to pay the freight to the plaintiffs as mortgagees.

In January of the present year the plaintiffs commenced the present action and claimed a declaration that they were the owners of the vessel in March, 1902, as duly registered first mortgagees, and as mortgagees in possession in April were entitled in priority to the defendants to the freights earned by the vessel while in their possession.

In February The Manar was sold to Swedish purchasers. The defendants, Messrs. Strachan Bros. and the liquidator of The Manar Steamship Co., applied in chambers (1) that as against Messrs. Strachan Bros. the action might be stayed or dismissed with costs, and (2) that as against The Manar Steamship Co., the action might be stayed until the plaintiffs indemnified the defendant company against all costs.

Ord. 25, r. 5, provides that: "No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a merely declaratory judgment or order is sought thereby and the court may make binding declarations of right whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not."

On behalf of the plaintiffs evidence was given that the French court would apply English law and therefore a declaratory judgment was sought, but the defendants alleged that the French court could apply French law and the judgment of the English court would have no further force than as evidence.

Robson, K.C., and Adair Roche, in support of the motion, on behalf of Messrs. Strachan Bros.

H. E. Wright, for the liquidator of The Manar Steamship Co., relied on Brooking v. Maudslay, Son, & Field, 36 W. R. 664, 38 Ch. D. 636.

Scrutton, K.C., and Balloch, for the plaintiffs, cited Hyman v. Helm, 32 W. R. 258, 24 Ch. D. 531; Simpson v. Fogo, 11 W. R. 418, 1 Hem. & M. 195; Liverpool Marine Credit Co. v. Hunter, 16 W. R. 1090.

BUCKNILL J., after stating the facts, said it has been argued in the first motion on behalf of the defendants, Strachan Bros., that in the circumstances the proceedings instituted by the plaintiffs, the Northern Trust (Limited), cannot be of practical utility to them. That they amount to an improper interference with the proceedings in another country, and that they are in their nature oppressive and vexatious. With regard, however, to the first objection I cannot rely on the affidavits of French lawyers which have been read in the course of the arguments addressed to me, for they do not make it clear what effect a judgment in this action would have upon the proceedings in France. I must, therefore, treat the matter as open, and on consideration I do not find that it has been made out to my satisfaction that the declarations sought by the plaintiffs will not be of practical utility to them, nor am I able to say that this action is an improper interference with the proceedings in France; and the defendants have failed to satisfy me that the declaration asked for is oppressive or vexatious, or an abuse of the process of this court. The result is that I see no reason for staying the action and therefore dismiss the first motion with costs. The second motion is made on behalf of the liquidator of The Manar Steamship Co. for the purpose of staying an action by the same plaintiffs in which they claim a declaration similar to the action I have just dealt with. The facts, however, in this second case are different. Here the plaintiffs have attacked the steamship company, though the company has not shown any desire to challenge the validity of the mortgage under which the vessel was taken possession of by the plaintiffs, or to challenge the right of the plaintiffs to freight earned under the charter-party. It is true that the liquidator has alleged in his affidavit filed in this action that the mortgage on the ship may be invalid on the ground that "no valid resolution of the company was passed authorizing the borrowing of the sums in question, and that "there are substantial and complicated questions to be inquired into before judgment can be properly given in this action; but there are no funds belonging to the company for the defence of this action, in which no substantial relief is claimed against the company, and which is, I believe, brought against the company solely for the purpose of obtaining a declaration as to English law to be used by the plaintiffs in certain proceedings in the French courts."

From that affidavit I gather that it is possible that the company, apparently without funds, and now in liquidation, and without any desire to litigate, may hereafter choose to claim on behalf of those interested a declaration that the mortgage is invalid; but this is not a case where the contract is alleged to be void. The allegation amounts to no more than this—that within the time limited by law the company may, perhaps, seek to set the mortgage aside. The plaintiffs, however, say that this question must be settled now. The liquidator, on the other hand, says he is not bound to have his hand forced, and, in support of that view a passage has been read from Stirling, J., in Brooking v. Maudslay, Son, & Field, 38 Ch. Div. 636, at p. 645, which appears to me to be in point.

The plaintiffs at the present time are in a position of having lent a sum of money on mortgage, taken possession of the ship, chartered her, and earned freight, whilst the defendants, The Manar Steamship Co., though aware of these proceedings, have not been antagonistic. The company has not attacked the plaintiffs, and until the plaintiffs were attacked by Strachan Bros. in France matters between the plaintiffs and the defendant company were at rest. After, however, Strachan Bros. had proceeded in France against the defendant company in respect of necessaries supplied to the ship of which the plaintiffs are mortgagees, but in which the defendant company did not appear, the Northern Trust (Limited), as plaintiffs, put the law in motion by the present proceedings against the defendant company for no other reason, so far as I can see, than to obtain a declaration for use in France in litigation to which the defendants, The Manar Steamship Co., have not made themselves parties. It seems to me, therefore, that this proceeding is oppressive and vexatious, and I direct that the plaintiffs' action be stayed—not dismissed—and that the costs be paid by the plaintiffs.

MCQUIRE v. WESTERN MORNING NEWS CO. (a.)

Libel—Fair comment—Criticism on literary work—Province of jury.

Where the defence of fair comment is set up in an action for libel in respect of a criticism on a literary work, the jury ought not to be left to make their own opinion of the literary merits of the work the test of fairness or unfairness. Unless there is in the criticism some element which may support an inference of unfairness in some other sense, such as an attack on the personal character of the plaintiff or an imputation that the plaintiff has written something which he has not in fact written, it is the duty of the judge to withdraw the case from the jury and to hold that there is no libel.

Application by the defendants for judgment or new trial in an action tried before Ridley, J., and a jury.

The plaintiff was an author, actor, and theatrical manager, and the action was brought to recover damages for an alleged libel published of and concerning the plaintiff as an actor and theatrical manager, and the author of a certain play, in the defendant's newspaper, the Western Morning News.

On the 24th of June, 1901, the plaintiff produced at the Theatre Royal, Plymouth, a musical play written and composed by himself, and entitled The Major.

The play was performed by a travelling company under the management of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff himself took one of the parts.

The alleged libel was contained in a criticism on the play which appeared in the Western Morning News on the 25th of June, 1901, and was as follows: "A three-act musical absurdity, entitled The Major, written and composed by Mr. T. C. McQuire, was presented last evening before a full house by the author's company. It cannot be said that many left the building with the satisfaction of having seen anything like the standard of play which is generally to be witnessed at the Theatre Royal. Although it may be described as a play, The Major is composed of nothing but nonsense of a not very humorous character, whilst the music is far from attractive. This comedy would be very much improved had it a substantial plot and were a good deal of the sorry stuff taken out of it, which lowers both the players and the play. No doubt the actors and actresses are well suited to the piece, which gives excellent scope for music-hall artistes to display their talent. Among Mr. McQuire's company there is not one good actor or actress, and, with the exception of Mr. Ernest Braime, not one of them can be said to have a voice for singing. The introduction of common, not to say vulgar, songs does not tend to improve the character of the performance, and the dancing, which forms a prominent feature, is carried out with very little gracefulness."

The innuendo set out in the statement of claim was as follows: "By the said words the defendants meant and were understood to mean, and the meaning of the said words, is, that the said play was dull, vulgar, and degrading, that the members of the plaintiff's company were incompetent as actors, singers, and dancers, that they were music-hall artistes, and that the plaintiff was himself incompetent both as an actor and composer as aforesaid."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants by their defence pleaded that the matter complained of was published by them in the ordinary course of their business as public journalists, and without any malice, and that it was a fair and bonâ fide criticism upon the plaintiff's play and its performance, which were matters of public interest, and was therefore no libel.

At the trial evidence was given as to the character of the play and its performance. There was no evidence of any personal malice towards the plaintiff, or of any indirect motive, on the part of the writer of the criticism, or of any one responsible for the management of the defendants' newspaper.

RIDLEY, J., left to the jury the question whether the criticism complained of was or was not a libel. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £100 damages.

The defendants applied for judgment or a new trial.

Duke, K.C., and J. A. Hawke, for the defendants.—The words complained of are merely fair comment and bonâ fide criticism, the subject of the comment and criticism being a literary work which has been submitted to the judgment of the public. The right of fair comment and fair criticism on books and other literary productions has been clearly established in a series of authorities—viz., Carr v. Hood, 1 Camp. 355; Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569, 3 B. & S. 769; and Merivale v. Carson, 36 W. R. 231, 20 Q. B. D. 275. The expressions "fair comment" and "fair criticism" mean that which may fairly be considered comment or criticism; they do not mean such comment or criticism as a jury may think to be fair or temperate. So long as criticism remains criticism on literary or other work, and does not break away into an attack on private character, then, although in the opinion of a jury it may be excessive or exaggerated, it does not constitute a libel. In this case the learned judge, after hearing the whole of the evidence, ought to have told the jury that there was no evidence of anything beyond fair comment, and to have directed a verdict and judgment for the defendant.

They also cited Wason v. Walter, 17 W. R. 169, L. R. 4 Q. B. 73; South Hetton Coal Co. v. North Eastern News Association, 42 W. R. 322, [1894] 1 Q. B. 133; Henwood v. Harrison, 20 W. R. 1,000, L. R. 7 C. P. 606; Paris v. Levy, 9 W. R. 71, 9 C. B. N. S. 342; and Macleod v. Wakley, 3 C. & P. 311.

Clavell Salter, for the plaintiff.—The argument for the defendants treats fair comment as being co-extensive with comment, and leaves no room at all for unfair comment. But what the law protects is not all comment, but fair comment as distinguished from unfair comment. The test for distinguishing between the two is whether the expression of the comment is fair or not, and that is a question for the jury. The jury are to say, not whether they agree with the comment, but whether the comment exceeds the bounds of what is fair. There is no ground for setting aside the verdict of the jury in this case.

Duke, K.C., replied.

May 11.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an application by the defendants for a new trial or judgment in an action for libel tried before Ridley, J. The plaintiff is an author and actor, and the action is founded upon a notice which appeared in the defendants' newspaper of a musical play written and composed by the plaintiff and produced by a company under his management at the principal theatre in Plymouth. The plaintiff himself acted a part in the play. The notice complained of was as follows: [His lordship read the alleged libel as set out above.] It appears on the face of the statement of claim that the notice complained of was a dramatic criticism of a play publicly acted; and therefore it could not be, and was not, contended for the plaintiff that there was any libel unless the criticism exceeded the bounds of "fair comment." It was not suggested that there was any evidence of actual malice, there were no personal imputations, nor could any statement of fact be impugned. The innuendo set out in the claim does not charge any misstatement of fact, but confines itself to matters of opinion only. It is as follows: "By the said words the defendants meant and were understood to mean, and the meaning of the said words is, that the said play was dull, vulgar, and degrading, that the members of the plaintiff's company were incompetent as actors, singers, and dancers, that they were music-hall artistes, and that the plaintiff was himself incompetent both as an actor and composer as aforesaid." The plaintiff, however, contended that the notice, though comment, was not "fair comment"; and the jury apparently adopted this view, and found for the plaintiff, with £100 damages. The defendants challenge the verdict on the ground of misdirection, and also as being against the weight of evidence; but they rested their case mainly on the ground that on the facts admitted and proved it was competent for the court itself, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, to enter judgment for the defendants.

This raises a very important question as to what are the limits of "fair comment" on a literary work, and as to what are the respective provinces of the judge and jury with respect thereto. One thing, however, is perfectly clear, and that is that the jury have no right to substitute their own opinion of the literary merits of the work for that of the critic, or to try the "fairness" of the criticism by any such standard. "Fair," therefore, in this collocation certainly does not mean that which the ordinary, reasonable man, "the man on the Clapham omnibus," as Lord Bowen phrased it, the juryman common or special, would think a correct appreciation of the work; and it is of the highest importance to the community that the critic should be saved from any such possibility. In principle, therefore, there would be nothing to leave to the jury unless there was some element in the criticism which might support an inference of unfairness in some other sense. No doubt this element might be, and has been described in various ways, and different instances of it given; but, broadly, I think Mr. Duke is right in contending that, in the case of a literary work at all events, it is something that passes out of the domain of criticism itself. Criticism cannot be used as a cloak for mere invective, nor for personal imputations not arising out of the subject-matter or not based on fact. "If," says Lord Ellenborough in Carr v. Hood, reported in a note to Tabart v. Tipper, 1 Camp. 350, "the commentator does not step aside from the work or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation he exercises a fair and legitimate right. . . . Had the party writing the criticism followed the plaintiff into domestic life for the purposes of slander, that would have been libellous" And, in another passage, "Show me an attack upon the moral character of this plaintiff or any attack upon his character unconnected with his authorship, and I shall be as ready as any judge who ever sate here to protect him." In Merivale v. Carson, Bowen, L.J., says: "In the case of literary criticism it is not easy to conceive what would be outside that region"—i.e., of fair comment—"unless the writer went out of his way to make a personal attack on the character of the author of the work which he was criticizing. In such a case the writer would be going beyond the limits of criticism altogether, and therefore beyond the limits of fair criticism. . . . . Still, there is another class of cases in which, as it seems to me, the writer would be travelling out of the region of fair criticism—I mean if he imputes to the author that he has written something which in fact he has not written. That would be a misdescription of the work." I think "fair" embraces the meaning of honest and also of relevancy. The view expressed must be honest and must be such as can fairly be called criticism, I am aware that the word "moderate" has been used in this connexion—Wason v. Walter—with reference to comment on the conduct of a public man; but I think it is only used to express the idea that invective is not criticism. It certainly cannot mean moderate in the sense that that which is deemed by a jury, in the case of a literary criticism, extravagant, and the outcome of prejudice on the part of an honest writer, is necessarily beyond the limit of fair comment—see Merivale v. Carson. No doubt in most cases of this class there are expressions in the impugned document capable of being interpreted as falling outside the limit of honest criticism, and therefore it is proper to leave the question to the jury, and in all cases where there may be a doubt it may be convenient to take the opinion of a jury. But it is always for the judge to say whether the document is capable in law of being a libel. It is, however, for the plaintiff, who rests his claim upon a document which on his own statement purports to be a criticism of a matter of public interest, to show that it is a libel—i.e., that it travels beyond the limit of fair criticism; and therefore it must be for the judge to say whether it is reasonably capable of being so interpreted. If it is not, there is no question for the jury, and it would be competent for him to give judgment for the defendant. In Henwood v. Harrison the action was against the Queen's printer, who, under the direction of the Lords of the Admiralty, had printed a blue-book containing a letter defamatory of the plaintiff and had sold copies of the same in ordinary course. The defence was that the letter was a fair comment on a matter of public importance. It was admitted that the defendant acted bonâ fide and without malice. Brett, J., nonsuited the plaintiff, and the Court of Common Pleas, Grove, J., dissenting, upheld the nonsuit. Willes, J., who delivered the judgment of the majority, said: "In actions of libel, as in other cases where questions of fact, when they arise, are to be decided by the jury, it is for the court first to determine whether there is any evidence upon which a rational verdict for the affirmant could be founded." In that case, as in this, actual malice was not suggested, but the plaintiff nevertheless insisted that there was a question for the jury, and the ground of the non-suit, which was upheld, was that the publication was "in the nature of fair criticism of a proposal affecting a matter of great national importance." That case, therefore, in its actual decision is directly in point. The decision, so far as I know, has never been questioned, though exception has been taken to the use of the word "privilege" to describe the public right of fair comment, and some eminent judges have preferred not to use a word which according to its technical etymology, denotes the special right of an individual as extending to cover the common rights of the whole community at large. In Merivale v. Carson, Bowen, L.J., treats the difference of view as one rather concerned with the "metaphysical exposition" of the origin of the right itself than with the limits of its exercise, and he adds: "But the question is rather academical than practical, for I do not think it would make any substantial difference in the present case which view was the right one." Indeed, since the time of Lord Ellenborough, there does not seem to have been any difference as to the extent and limits of the right itself in the case of literary criticism, and it was more commonly than not treated as resting on the principle explained by Willes, J., in Henwood v. Harrison, which was decided in 1872, after Campbell v. Spottiswoode, decided in 1863, until Merivale v. Carson, decided in 1887: see, for instance, Wason v. Walter, decided in 1868. It certainly does not seem that the learned judges who suggested the later exposition of the right intended in any way to abridge the right of the critic as measured by the doctrine of "privileged occasion," or to interfere with the respective provinces of judge and jury in questions of libel. I think these considerations throw some light on the genesis and meaning of the word "fair" in the expression "fair comment," which is not of merely recent origin and co-existed with the view that the doctrine of "privileged occasion" applied to such cases. The comment, in order to be within the protection of the privilege, had to be fair—i.e., not such as to disclose in itself actual malice. It also had to be relevant; otherwise it never was within it, and the judge could hold as a matter of law that the privilege did not extend to it, Huntley v. Ward, 6 C. B. N. S. 514, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 39; Warren v. Warren, 1 Cr. M. & R 250, and in such case the only defence was truth. These factors were, I think, intended to be covered compendiously by the epithet "fair." In other words, it was intended to exclude those elements which took the comment out of, or prevented it from falling within, the privilege of the occasion. The result is that the question of "fair comment" is no more exclusively for the jury in one view of the nature of the right than in the other. In my opinion, there is in this case, in the language of Willes, J., above cited, no evidence on which a rational verdict for the plaintiff can be founded, and the defendants are therefore entitled to have judgment entered for them. In this view it is not necessary to consider the grounds on which a new trial is asked for; but if there was any evidence fit to be considered by a jury, I am clearly of opinion that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Further, as to misdirection, I think that, though at the outset of his summing-up the learned judge correctly laid down the law as to the extent of the defendants' right of criticism, the latter part of his summing up may have helped the jury to apply the standard of their own taste to the appreciation of the thing criticized, and to measure the rights of the critic accordingly. We have had excerpts from the play, including the songs and the stage directions, read to us; and I think it right to say that, in my opinion, it would be matter of regret for all well-wishers of the stage if an honest critic were debarred from commenting in the sense of this criticism on such a production.

VAMPLEW AND OTHERS v. PARKGATE IRON AND STEEL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Compensation for injury by accident—"Workman"—Independent contractor—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7 (2).

A contractor, who enters into an agreement to be paid weekly for the amount of work which he and his own workmen can do, and who meets with an accident in the course of his employment with manufacturers at their works, is not himself a "workman" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

This was an appeal from the refusal of the learned judge of the Rotherham County Court to award compensation to the dependents of a deceased workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The question was whether the deceased man was a workman or an independent contractor, and the evidence upon which the county court judge held that he was an independent contractor, and that the dependents were therefore not entitled to compensation under the Act, was to this effect.

Vamplew had entered into a sub-contract to work for the respondent company at breaking steel and clearing cinders, being paid weekly by the ton. He had five men and two boys working under him, whom he engaged and discharged, and the average amount of his weekly earnings was £4.

H. W. W. Wilberforce, for the appellants.—The county court judge apparently intended to decide this case on the authority of Simmons v. Faulds, 17 Times L. R. 352, where it was held that the applicant, a foreman bricklayer, was a sub-contractor to supply labour, and was therefore not within the Act. In the subsequently decided case of Evans v. Penwyllt Dinas Silica Brick Co., 18 Times L. R. 58, in which the facts were more similar to the present case, this court held that there was evidence justifying the county court judge's finding that the applicant was a workman, and not an independent contractor. It is not necessary that the workman should be a mere servant to come within the Act. The words of section 7, sub-section 2, are: "Every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise and is expressed or implied, is oral or in writing."

Ruegg, K.C., and Arthur Sims, for the respondents, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—This was an appeal from a decision of the Rotherham county court judge, who has found as a fact that the deceased man was employed as a contractor and not as a workman. If there was any evidence to justify the county court judge arriving at that finding, then this court cannot interfere. The burden is on the applicants to show that there existed between the deceased man and the respondents such a relationship as brings the case within the definition of "workman" in section 7 (2) of the Act of 1897. The words of that section are no doubt very wide, but the cardinal fact in consideration of the question is that the Act on the face of it deals with the relation of employer and employed. This is shown by the title of the Act and by the words in the definition itself—

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"engaged in an employment to which this Act applies." Where a man undertakes to do work as a contractor, that, primâ facie at any rate, negatives the existence of the relation of employer and employed. Here the deceased man worked for the respondents on the terms that he was to be paid so much per ton; and that he was responsible as a contractor for getting the work done and himself employed workmen for that purpose, though, of course, he was not debarred from working himself. In my opinion there is here clearly evidence on which the county court judge might find as he did that his position was that of an independent contractor and not a servant. For these reasons the appeal fails.

Stirling, L.J.—I agree. I should have preferred that more evidence should have been given as to the relationship between the deceased and the respondents. Upon the evidence before the county court judge, who appears to have directed himself in accordance with the decision in Simmons v. Faulds, I cannot say that he made any mistake in law in arriving at the conclusion of fact to which he came.

Mathew, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was urged for the appellants that the attention of the county court judge, who decided this case in accordance with the decision in Simmons v. Faulds, was not called to the case of Evans v. Penwyllt Dinas Silica Brick Co., and that if it had been he must have arrived at a different conclusion. But when that case is examined it will be seen that there is no foundation for that argument. The decision there rested on a special agreement. The applicant there was a quarryman, who was paid so much for every ton he worked, and had men employed by himself working under him, and this court upheld the finding of the county court judge that he was a workman. But in that case there was an understanding between the applicant and the manager of the quarry that he should be compensated in case of accident. Therefore the ground of the decision there was that the applicant by this special agreement should be treated as a workman within the meaning of the Act of 1897.

I cannot say in the case we are now considering that the county court judge has made any mistake in law in arriving at the conclusion of fact that he came to.

Giles v. Belford, Smith, & Co. (a.)

Master and servant—Workmen's compensation—Dock labourer—"Average weekly earnings"—Irregular employment for over twelve months—Mode of calculation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), First Schedule 1 (b).

A stevedore's labourer claimed compensation for injuries occasioned to him by an accident which happened on the 28th of November, 1902, while in the employment of a firm of master stevedores. The county court judge found that he was not engaged by the firm for any definite period, but had been from time to time employed by them, and that during the period between the 2nd and 10th of November he was not working for the firm, but that from the 11th to the 28th he was continuously in their employment. He accordingly awarded him compensation calculated on the average of his weekly earnings during the last-named period.

Held, dismissing the appeal, that, notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lords in Lysons v. Knowles & Sons, 49 W. R. 636, [1901] A. C. 79, the basis upon which the county court judge had assessed his award was right, as the period of continuous employment was sufficiently long to establish a basis for striking an average under the schedule.

Jones v. Ocean Coal Co., 47 W. R. 484, [1899] 2 Q. B. 124, approved and followed.

Appeal from an award of the learned judge sitting at the Bow County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, who had held that the applicant was entitled to compensation. The only question in the case was the proper method of calculating the amount of compensation which the applicant should receive under the award.

By paragraph 1 of the first schedule to the Act, "The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . . (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed £1."

The respondent was a stevedore's labourer, who met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the appellants, who were master stevedores. The accident happened on the 28th of November, 1902. The applicant had then been working for the employers, not continuously, but irregularly, for a period of more than twelve months. During the twelve months preceding the accident he had worked in every month except May, June, and July, during the whole of which three months he had been in hospital. In the other months he had worked for part of most weeks. In November, 1902, however, he did not work for the first ten days of the month. He worked on the 11th, and then continued working every day until the 28th, when the accident happened.

The county court judge found as a fact that the nature of the applicant's employment was that of work under a daily contract, and he calculated the average weekly earnings, which were to be the basis of the compensation, by adding together the applicant's actual earnings for the eighteen days from the 11th of November to the 28th of November, and dividing the total by three, the number of weeks into which the eighteen days extended. From an award made on this basis the employers appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and Ellis Hill, for the appellants.—The county court judge here calculated the workman's weekly earnings upon a wrong principle. He ought to have added together the earnings of the applicant during the twelve months preceding the accident, and divided the total either by fifty-two or by the number of weeks in which he actually worked. In Jones v. Ocean Coal Co., 47 W. R. 484, [1899] 2 Q. B. 124, there had been a continuous employment for a period, and a break of that employment had taken place, and then the workman was subsequently employed again for a continuous period, and, in estimating his average weekly earnings under the first schedule only the latter period of employment was regarded. But here there was really no continuous employment at any time. The employment was casual daily employment, and the man's services were casual. In Lysons v. Knowles & Sons, 49 W. R. 636, [1901] A. C. 79, it was held that the applicant, although he had been employed less than two weeks, came within the benefit of the Act. Lord Halsbury, L.C., there, in giving his view of the meaning to be attached to the words "average weekly earnings," said: "If a man was only employed at irregular intervals or at irregular amounts you were to get at what the average was by putting them together and striking an average so as to afford a test of the weekly sum to be paid." Therefore, in the Lord Chancellor's view as expressed in that case, the county court judge here should have calculated the respondent's average weekly earnings with reference to the whole year, and not merely to the period from the 11th to the 28th of November.

He also cited Keast v. Barrow Hematite Steel Co., 15 Times L. R. 141, and Ayres v. Buckeridge, 50 W. R. 115, [1902] 1 K. B. 57.

Shakespeare, for the workman.—This point was not raised in Lysons v. Knowles & Sons, and therefore that case does not apply here. All that was decided in that case was that the Act applied to casual labourers, and was not restricted to workmen who had been employed for two whole weeks at least. In Williams v. Poulson, 16 Times L. R. 42, the applicant for compensation was a casual dock labourer. Between the 5th of March, 1898, and the 25th of January, 1899, he had been working for the respondent during a portion of each week except on four occasions, when he did not work for the respondent for reasons not appearing. The county court judge found that the applicant had been in the employment of the respondent during the period mentioned, and had during that time earned so much. This sum he divided by the number of weeks during which the employment lasted, and he awarded the applicant one-half of the sum so found. That case was heard after Jones v. Ocean Coal Co. had been decided, and which it followed. The principle adopted by the learned county court judge here was therefore in accordance with the rule laid down in Jones v. Ocean Coal Co. and Williams v. Poulson. Both these authorities being in favour of the respondent's contention, this appeal should be dismissed.

Ruegg, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an award of the judge of the Bow County Court awarding compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to a stevedore's labourer. The judge has found as a fact that the applicant's employment began on the 11th of November and continued till the 28th of November, when the accident happened, and on that footing he had assessed compensation. It was urged in support of this appeal that the applicant had been employed by the same employers, and had worked for them, at short intervals from time to time, with one interval of three months, during a period of more than twelve months preceding the accident. The answer to that was that the county court judge had found as a fact that there was a complete break in the employment before the 11th of November, and that the employment in question began on that day, and therefore he did not calculate the average amount of the workman's weekly earnings for the purposes of compensation by reference to any preceding period. In those circumstances, it seems to me that there was no difficulty in following the express provisions of paragraph 1 (b) of the first schedule to the Act. It might be that, in cases which did not appear to be expressly provided for in the schedule, it would be the duty of the county court judge to do the best he could, with such materials as he had, to determine what a workman's average weekly earnings were. But there was nothing to prevent him from following the terms of the schedule, when he had before him all the materials which enabled him to do as the schedule required. [His lordship read the paragraph of the schedule.] This court decided in Jones v. Ocean Coal Co. (Limited) and other cases that the word "employment" in the expression "in the employment of the same employer" meant a substantially continuous employment. It would be impossible for us now, without overruling those decisions, to say that this workman had been in the employment of the employers for twelve months within the meaning of the schedule. The decision of the House of Lords in Lysons v. Knowles that this Act applied to casual labourers does not interfere with the previous decisions of this court as to continuous employment. All that was there decided was that a workman is not debarred from compensation because his case cannot be brought within the precise terms of the first schedule to the Act. No dissent was expressed from the view taken by this court in various cases of which I may particularly refer to Jones v. Ocean Coal Co. In this case the applicant had not been in continuous employment for twelve months, but he had been in employment from the 11th of November for a period long enough to furnish a fair basis for calculating the average weekly earnings in accordance with the schedule. In my opinion the county court judge has adopted the right method of assessing the compensation, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

WHEELER v. TOOTELL. (a.)

Settlement—Will—Land purchased by equitable tenant for life, under power, with moneys belonging to personal estate—Lien of trustees on land to secure purchase-moneys—Custody of the title-deeds.

A testator gave real and personal property in trust to accumulate rents and profits during the minority of H., who was to be (and in fact was) let into possession on attaining twenty-one as tenant for life. A private Act authorized land to be purchased by the court at the instance of a tenant for life of full age, and to be paid for out of the personalty. The moneys so paid were to be deemed a debt from the real to the personal estate, which debt was to be held by the trustees as part of the personalty and secured by a lien on the purchased land. Subject to such lien the purchased land was to be settled on the trusts of the will.

Held, that, as to land so purchased, the trustees, so long as their lien existed, were entitled to the custody of the title-deeds.

This was a summons taken out by the defendants to have it determined whether they, as trustees of the settlement created by the will hereinafter mentioned, were entitled to the possession and custody of certain deeds, documents, and muniments of title, or whether the plaintiffs, one of whom was equitable tenant for life under the settlement, were entitled to such possession and custody. If the former should be the case the applicants asked for an order for delivery to them on oath of all the said deeds, documents, and muniments.

Henry Belward Ray, by his will, dated the 19th of February, 1856, gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to receive the rents and profits and accumulate the same until his nephew, Herbert Wheeler, should attain the age of twenty-one years, when he was to be put into possession of the same for his life, with remainders over.

This suit was commenced on behalf of the said nephew (whose full name was Herbert Reginald Wheeler) when an infant. He attained the age of twenty-one in 1866, when he was let into possession, and assumed the surname of Ray.

In 1877 he was found to be of unsound mind, and his committee was one of the present plaintiffs.

The defendants were the present trustees of the will, and were also trustees of the settlement created thereby for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890.

The above-mentioned will contained no powers of sale or leasing, and a private Act of Parliament was passed to supply the deficiency, under the short title of "The Ray Estate Act, 1858," which received the Royal Assent on the 2nd of August, 1858, and which incorporated the provisions as to leases and sales of the Leases and Sales Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120.

Under section 22 of the Ray Estate Act the Court of Chancery had power (inter alia) at any time or times, at the instance (as therein specified) of a tenant for life of full age, to apply any part of the residuary personal estate of the testator in or towards the purchase of messuages, lands, and hereditaments, and all moneys so applied were, as between the residuary personal estate and the residuary real estate, to be deemed a debt due with interest from the real estate to the personal estate. The trustees of the will were to have a lien by way of equitable mortgage on the hereditaments so purchased for the moneys so applied with interest at 4 per cent. per annum, and were to hold the moneys and interest so secured as part of the personal estate of the testator. Subject to such lien, the hereditaments so purchased were to be settled and assured to the same uses and on the same trusts as were by the said will limited and declared of and concerning the residuary real estate devised thereby.

In accordance with these provisions considerable purchases of land had been made and the plaintiffs claimed the right to retain the title-deeds relating thereto.

Macnaghten, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the applicants.—The trustees are equitable mortgagees, and as such are entitled to the possession of the title-deeds.

Eve, K.C., and Spencer Butler, for the plaintiffs, cited In re Newen, Newen v. Barnes, [1894] 2 Ch. 297; In re Wythes, West v. Wythes, 41 W. R. 375, [1893] 2 Ch. 369; In re Richardson, Richardson v. Richardson, [1900] 2 Ch. 778, 49 W. R. Dig. 159; and In re Money-Kyrle's Settlement, Money-Kyrle v. Money-Kyrle, 49 W. R. 44, [1900] 2 Ch. 839.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—By the Ray Estate Act provision is made for keeping separate the real and personal property settled by the will of Henry Belward Ray. Though there is power to apply the personalty in the purchase of land, it is provided by section 22 that all money so applied shall be deemed a debt from the real to the personal estate, bearing interest, and that the trustees shall have a lien on the land so purchased as security by way of equitable mortgage for such debt and interest.

I am of opinion that as to the land purchased with moneys advanced by the trustees out of the personal estate, and on which they have a lien in respect of such advance, the trustees are entitled to the custody of the deeds.

This is not the case of an equitable tenant for life let into possession of the settled land, and asking for the custody of the title-deeds as between himself and the trustees. The applicants, as trustees of the personalty, are in the position of incumbrancers on the realty. A tenant for life of personalty is not entitled to come and ask for the title-deeds of the property. The applicants hold their lien on the purchased land as part of the personal estate of the testator; so that the cases cited do not apply.

I am of opinion, accordingly, that the trustees, so long as their lien exists, have a right to the possession and custody of the deeds and documents of title relating to the purchased land.

WEST LANCASHIRE RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Highway—Level crossing over railway—Alteration of inclination of road—Liability of local authority to keep in repair raised parts of highway—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 16, 56.

Where a railway company crosses a highway on a higher level than the road and necessarily has to construct a permanent inclined plane on each side of the railway so as to admit of vehicles using the crossing, section 16 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, does not cast the duty of maintaining and repairing the approaches upon the railway company.

Case stated in an action to determine a question between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to the liability of the defendants, the railway company, to maintain the inclined planes or approaches to a level crossing of the railway. The level crossing had been authorized, but it was found necessary to raise the approaches, and for some time the repairs were carried out by the railway.

On the 4th of December, 1901, the defendants wrote that, having been advised that they were not liable to maintain any portion of the road outside the crossing gates, they gave the plaintiffs notice that they had ceased to repair the same.

The plaintiffs having after the receipt of the notice executed repairs costing £90, brought their action to recover that amount.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the plaintiffs.—The determination of the sole question raised by the case turns on the true construction of section 16 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The company having elected to do works under that section, the sanction they received carried with it a liability to maintain in proper repair the permanent inclined planes which took the place of a bridge over the line.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He cited Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v. Bury Corporation, 14 App. Cas. 417, 38 W. R. Dig. 172.

Rowlatt, for the defendants.—After the approaches were made and the roadway put in an efficient state of repair, all further liability to maintain the approaches ceased. Under section 56 of the Act of 1845 there was no continuing liability cast upon them, and the requirements of that section ended when the road was restored. The case cited by the plaintiffs is distinguishable from the present case. There the railway was crossed by a bridge and the approaches of the bridge were held repairable by the company as being in fact part of the bridge.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case I think I must hold that the words of section 16 of the Act of 1845 cannot be so construed as to cast, as the plaintiffs affirm, the duty of maintenance and repair of these approaches to the level crossing upon the railway company. It was said on behalf of the plaintiffs that there was an obligation to be inferred from that section. I think the obligation of the railway company was fulfilled when they had satisfied section 56 and had restored the road. If I adopted the view of the plaintiffs and held that the words of section 16 implied an obligation to repair, then I should have to alter the word "may" into "shall." My judgment must therefore be for the defendants with costs.

BUSHELL v. HAMMOND AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing law—Renewal—Control of justices over structure of licensed premises—"Part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold"—Passage giving second entrance to bar—Jurisdiction to order passage to be closed—Licensing Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 11, sub-section 4.

Held, that the power conferred on licensing justices by section 11 of the Licensing Act, 1902, to refuse to renew a licence unless "such alterations as they think reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the premises shall be made in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed" applied to any part of the licensed premises to which customers had access.

Therefore an order closing a passage which led to the bars and formed a second entrance to the licensed premises, the evidence being that although no liquor was sold or consumed at the back entrance or in the passage, it was frequently used by customers entering and leaving the premises, was one that the justices had jurisdiction to make.

This was an appeal by case stated from a decision of justices sitting at the East Kent Quarter Sessions, who had dismissed the appeal of the appellant against an order made by the respondents, the justices of Ramsgate, under the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 11 (4).

The case stated the following facts: The appellant, G. H. Bushell, was the tenant of a fully-licensed public-house known as the Coach and Horses, Ramsgate, under a licence which would have expired on the 5th of April, 1903. At the annual general licensing meeting for Ramsgate held in February, 1903, the appellant applied for a renewal of his licence. The justices required the production of a plan of the premises, and at the adjourned meeting in March they renewed the licence, but subject to the condition that the appellant should close by means of an iron gate to be kept locked and only opened when necessary for the delivery of beer, coals, or other goods, a passage which ran by the side of the hotel from which access could be obtained to the bars. The words on the lamp and on the wall, to the effect that the passage led to the bars, were also to be obliterated.

On the hearing of the appeal it was proved that intoxicating liquor was sold and consumed in the bar, bar parlour, and club room, but that no intoxicating liquor was sold at or near the back entrance or in the passage leading thereto. No evidence was given to show that liquor was ever consumed in the passage but it was admitted that there was nothing to prevent such consumption, and that the back entrance and passage were in fact used by customers for entering and leaving the premises.

It was proved that it entailed extra work on the police to exercise the supervision necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business so long as the back entrance remained unclosed.

It was contended by the appellant that the respondents had no jurisdiction to make the order on the ground that it was not an alteration in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor was sold or consumed.

The quarter sessions held that the justices had jurisdiction under the Act to make the order.

Hohler, for the appellant.

Dickens, K.C., and J. W. W. Weigall, for the respondent justices.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We have often criticized the language of Acts of Parliament and have complained of having to interpret them, but if we were to agree with the argument as to the true construction of this section put forward by Mr. Hohler we should defeat the usefulness of this enactment, which was clearly intended to give licensing justices control over the structure of licensed premises and to empower them to order such alterations thereto as in their opinion may be reasonably necessary for the proper conduct of the business. Here the police gave evidence that the existence of the passage necessitated greater supervision being exercised by them over the premises, and the justices came to the conclusion that it was desirable that the passage should be closed. The tenant appealed and said that they had no power to close the passage because it was not part of the premises upon which intoxicating liquor was sold by him, or in fact consumed by his customers. That question of jurisdiction depends on the construction of section 11 (4) of the Act of 1902, which enacts that on the renewal of a licence the justices may require that "such alterations as they think reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business shall be made in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold and consumed." If we were to hold that a club room was within the section, but that the passage outside leading to it was not, because liquor was not sold to be drunk in the passage but in the club room, we should be frittering away a most useful enactment. The finding of the justices was that, although beer was not drunk in the passage, yet that there was nothing in fact to prevent it being consumed there. If one looks at the plan of the premises it is quite obvious that the use of the passage by people who were drinking at the house would not be infrequent. Further, there is an express finding that the back entrance by the passage was used by customers for entering and leaving the bars, and therefore no question arises here as might be raised in another case that the ordered alterations were to part of the premises which, though covered by the licence, were in fact not used by the publican in the conduct of his business as such. For these reasons I think the justices were clearly right in coming to the conclusion that the alterations they desired made related to a part of the premises where intoxicating liquor was sold or consumed, and therefore that under the Act they had jurisdiction to make the order. Nor do I think that it can be said that the order was bad because it was unreasonable. Indeed it seems to me that they exercised their discretion in a very reasonable manner.

WILLS and CHANNELL, JJ., gave judgment to a like effect.

Hohler asked for leave to appeal.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—As this is a test case and raises a point, we will give you leave, but the granting of the application for leave must not be taken as suggesting that we have any doubt about the matter.

OGDENS (LIMITED) v. NELSON.
SAME v. TELFORD. (a.)

Contract—Agreement to participate in profits of business for a specific period—Sale of business within such period—Implied stipulation not to sell—Breach.

The plaintiffs brought an action for the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendants admitted the claim, but counter-claimed for damages in respect of an alleged breach of contract by the plaintiffs under the following circumstance. In March, 1902, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with the defendants whereby they agreed to participate with the defendants, for the period of four years from that date, in the profits of the plaintiff company's business on the goods sold for them by the defendants. In the course of the same year the plaintiffs sold their goodwill and business to another company. The defendants alleged that the plaintiffs had thereby committed a breach of contract, and they claimed damages in respect of such breach, on the ground that, owing to such sale, they, the defendants, were thereby prevented from participating in the profits promised by the plaintiffs for the remainder of the four years.

Held, that the plaintiffs had by the sale of their business committed a breach of contract, as there was an implied stipulation that they would continue to carry on their business for four years.

Test in Hamlyn v. Wood, 40 W. R. 24, [1891] 2 Q. B. 488, applied.

These two actions were tried before Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., without a jury. They both raised the same questions.

They were brought by the plaintiffs, a company in liquidation, to recover the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendants Nelson and Telford respectively, who were retail tobacconists.

The defendants admitted the claims, but counterclaimed for damages for breach of an agreement, dated the 22nd of March, 1902, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to participate with the defendants for a period of four years in the profits of the plaintiff company on goods sold for them by the defendants.

On the 27th of September in the same year the plaintiffs sold their undertaking and goodwill for a consideration to another company.

The defendants counterclaimed for damages for breach by the plaintiffs of their contract by selling their business and so preventing the defendants from participating in the profits promised by the plaintiffs for the remainder of the four years.

The point of law, therefore, arose solely on the counterclaims, and was whether the disposal of their business by the plaintiffs within the four years was a breach of their contract with the defendants.

The facts of the case and the arguments of counsel fully appear in the following reserved and written judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Asquith, K.C. (Duke, K.C., and F. E. Smith, with him) for the plaintiffs.

June 22.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment.—These were two actions brought by Odgens (Limited), a company in liquidation, to recover certain amount due for goods supplied to the defendants Nelson and Telford respectively. No question arises as to the plaintiffs' claims, which were admitted. The point for decision arises solely upon the counterclaims, which were set up under the following circumstances. Prior to the month of March, 1902, there had been considerable agitation in the retail tobacco trade respecting an alleged attempt by the plaintiff company to obtain control of the retail tobacco trade in the United Kingdom. This agitation led to the foundation of a company called the Imperial Tobacco Co. of Great Britain and Ireland (Limited), which had offered to various tobacco dealers, including the defendants, in consideration of their selling their goods of the company and undertaking not to buy any goods of the plaintiffs and certain other companies, a share in a bonus of £50,000 and a share of certain other expected profits of the Imperial Tobacco Co. The offers of the Imperial Tobacco Co. led to a counter-offer by the plaintiff company, which was accepted by the defendants, and the offer and acceptance constitute the agreement in respect of which the counter-claim was made. The offer of the plaintiffs was contained in the following letters: "Liverpool, March, 1902. 'Bonus distribution.' Our entire net profits and £200,000 per year for the next four years, commencing the 2nd of April, 1902. We will for the next four years distribute to such of our customers in the United Kingdom as purchase direct from us our entire net profits on the goods sold by us in the United Kingdom. In addition to the above we will for the next four years distribute to such of our customers in the United Kingdom as purchase direct from us the sum of £200,000 per year. Distribution of net profits will be made as soon after the 2nd of April, 1903, and annually thereafter, as the accounts can be audited, and will be in proportion to the purchases made during the year. Distribution as to the £200,000 per year will be made every three months, the first distribution to take place as soon after the 2nd of July, 1902, as accounts can be audited, and will be in proportion to the purchases during the three months' period. To participate in this offer we do not ask you to boycott the goods of any other manufacturer. Yours faithfully, OGDENS (LIMITED)." "March 22, 1902. Messrs.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ogdens (Limited), Liverpool. Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you I have not signed the agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Co. dated March, 1902; and, in consideration of participating in your bonus distribution of the entire net profits on goods sold by you in the United Kingdom, and £200,000 per year for the next four years, as set out in your particulars, I hereby agree not to sign it or any similar agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Co., or any other company or firm, containing any conditions which would prevent me from buying, displaying, selling, or distributing your goods or the goods of any other manufacturer, and I also undertake to continue to buy, display, and to sell your goods. (Signed), E. NELSON, 100, Queen-street, Cardiff." It was agreed that the contract between the plaintiffs and Telford, which forms the subject of the counterclaim in the other action, was the same. Pursuant to the bargain so made, the defendants dealt with the plaintiffs respectively, and in the month of July, 1902, they each received a share of the £50,000, being one-quarter of the £200,000 for the three months ended the 30th of June, 1902. On the 27th of September, 1902, the plaintiffs sold their undertaking, including the goodwill of their business in Great Britain, to the Imperial Tobacco Co.

The agreement was put in at the trial. The consideration was the sum of £1,500,000 in shares and certain stock, plant, and buildings at a valuation. The amount due to the defendants as their share of the second £50,000 bonus in respect of the three months ended the 30th of September was allowed to the defendants by the plaintiffs in account, and no question arises respecting that. It was agreed that no profits had been made by the plaintiffs in the six months ended the 30th of September, 1902, so that no claim was made under that head. The defendants did not ask for any account of profits due to them under the agreement up to the time of the sale of the plaintiffs' business to the Imperial Tobacco company. The defendants' real claim was for damages in respect of the alleged breach by the plaintiffs of the contract contained in the letters hereinbefore set out by reason of their having transferred their trading undertaking to the Imperial Company, thereby preventing themselves from being in a position to earn profits, and preventing the defendants from continuing as their customers, and it was further alleged that the plaintiffs, having received consideration amounting to £1,500,000 for assets, including their goodwill, had in fact sold their business to third parties, and were liable for damages for having deprived themselves of their ability to carry out their agreement. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that either the plaintiffs had wilfully prevented themselves from fulfilling their contract, or that it was an implied condition of the contract that the plaintiffs should continue to carry on their business. The questions of law which arise upon the above facts are, in my opinion, by no means free from difficulty. The case does not appear to me to be governed by any of the authorities which were cited to me. I propose, therefore, to consider in the first instance what are the propositions or principles of law to be deduced from the authorities, and then to endeavour to apply them to the facts of the case. It is, I think, clearly established as a general proposition that when two persons have entered into a contract, the performance of which on one or both sides is to extend over a period of time, each contracting party is bound to abstain from doing anything which will prevent him from fulfilling the obligations which he has undertaken to discharge; further, that where a person has undertaken to carry on a business out of the profits of which he has undertaken to pay certain moneys as a consideration for the contract to the other party to the contract, he must not by his own act or default disable and incapacitate himself from further carrying on such business. These propositions are, I think, established by M'Intyre v. Belcher, 11 W. R. 889, 14 C. B. N. S. 654; Inchbald v. Western Neilgherry Co., 13 W. R. 95, 17 C. B. N. S. 733; Turner v. Goldsmith, 39 W. R. 547, [1891] 1 Q. B. 544; Brace v. Calder, [1895] 2 Q. B. 253, 43 W. R. Dig. 113. It is further established that if the parties enter into an agreement to which effect can only be given by the continuance of an existing state of things, there is an implied engagement on the part of each that he will not do anything of his own motion to put an end to that state of circumstances, without the continuance of which effect cannot be given to the arrangement. This is, I think, established by the case of Stirling v. Maitland, 13 W. R. 76, 5 B. & S. 840; The Telegraph Despatch Co. v. M'Clean, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 658. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that in many, if not all, of these decisions the consideration on the one side was wholly performed either by the passing of property or by the payment of money. No doubt this was the fact in some of the cases, but there are certainly others to which that argument does not apply, as, for instance, Turner v. Goldsmith and Brace v. Calder. Side by side with these cases, if I may use the expression, there is the other line of authorities upon which the plaintiffs rely, which establish that where the parties have made a contract which contains a variety of stipulations, and is silent as to others, no stipulation or agreement which is not expressed ought to be implied, unless it is necessary in order to give to the transaction the effect or efficacy which both parties must have intended it should have: see the language of Bowen, L.J., in The Moorcock, 37 W. R. 439, 14 P. D. 64, at p. 68, approved of by Lord Esher in Hamlyn v. Wood, 40 W. R. 24, [1891] 2 Q. B. 488, at p. 492, and enunciated by the House of Lords in Rhodes v. Forwood, 24 W. R. 1078, 1 App. Cas. 256. But the real difficulty is not the enunciation of these principles, but their application. In each case the terms of the contract and its object must be considered in order to ascertain whether the conduct complained of does destroy the object of the contract or prevent the performance of its manifest intention. In this case I have come to the conclusion that the view presented by the defendants is correct. Whichever of the tests, as deduced from the authorities to which I have called attention, be applied, the decision must, I think, be in their favour. There was an undoubted change of position on the part of the defendants. By the acceptance of the plaintiffs' offer they relinquished the prospect of any share in the offer made by the Imperial Co. As regards the £200,000 per annum for a period of four years, the offer was definite and distinct, and, to adopt the language of Bowen, L.J., the continuance of business by the plaintiffs for a period of four years must have been in the contemplation of both parties in order to give to the transaction the effect which they intended it to have. I therefore think that, applying the test laid down in Hamlyn v. Wood, effect cannot be given to this transaction except upon the theory that the plaintiffs continued to carry on business at least for a period of four years. There is, moreover, in my opinion, another ground upon which the defendants are entitled to rely. Several of the authorities to which I have referred show that if one party has wilfully put an end to his ability to perform a contract he has committed a breach in respect of which damages can be awarded. In this case, in September, 1902, the plaintiffs sold the goodwill of their business for a very large price to the Imperial Co. It is common knowledge that in estimating the price that is paid for goodwill the value of the business is taken into consideration, and a certain number of years' purchase, or in some cases, a fraction of a year's purchase, of the net profits is estimated, having regard to the nature and character of the business. In this case the effect of the transaction is that the plaintiff company sell their goodwill to the Imperial Co., or, in other words, they realize for a consideration their opportunity and expectation of earning profits which they otherwise would have made. It is to be observed, moreover, that the sale renders the performance of the contract impossible so far as the distribution of the £200,000 is concerned, because it makes it impossible for the defendants any longer to be customers of the plaintiffs, or, in other words, destroys the possiblity of the existence of that state of things without which the contract could not be carried into effect. The act of the plaintiffs prevents the defendants from being able to fulfil the condition contemplated by the contract. I express the conclusion at which I have arrived with considerable diffidence and hesitation, and there is much to be urged in favour of the plaintiffs' contention. I was disposed at one time to think that the reasoning of the judgment in Rhodes v. Forwood, in which case the circumstances in many respects resemble those in the present case, and particularly the passage in the judgment of Lord Cairns, 1 App. Cas., at pp. 265 and 266, which was relied upon by Mr. Asquith, apply to this case, but on further examination I think that that case depended entirely upon the view taken by Lord Cairns as to the limited scope of the agreement as explained at pp. 263, 264 (see also the judgment of Lord Penzance), and I think it well to call attention to the view taken of Rhodes v. Forwood, in later cases, and among others by Lindley, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in Turner v. Goldsmith [1891], 1 Q. B., at p. 549. I do not propose at present to deal with the question of damages beyond saying this. It is not, in my opinion, a case for an account; the damages must be general damages estimated, taking all things into consideration, as in the case of Inchbald v. Western Neilgherry Co., and I doubt whether any case has been made for claiming anything in respect of the possible share of profits.

Judgment accordingly for the defendants on their counterclaims.

Question as to damages ordered to stand over for further consideration.

In re FRANCIS (No. 2). (a.)

Copyright — Music—Summary jurisdiction — Evidence that pirated copies were being sold at a private house — Magistrate's order for seizure—Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 15), ss. 1, 2.

The words "sold or offered for sale" in section 1 of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, are not confined to a sale in a public place.

Therefore, where a court of summary jurisdiction is satisfied that pirated copies of a musical work are being sold at a private house it has jurisdiction to make an order in the terms of the section, authorizing a constable to seize such copies without a warrant.

Semble, a court of summary jurisdiction has no power under section 1 to issue a search warrant.

This was an appeal by case stated from the decision of a metropolitan magistrate, sitting at the Clerkenwell police-court, raising a question of law on an information laid by William Francis and others, under section 1 of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Copyright Act, 1902, that at a private house, No. 102, Compton-passage, Clerkenwell, pirated copies of musical works were being sold privately, and that the appellants were the registered owners of the copyrights, of which some of the pirated copies were infringements, and the magistrate was asked to make an order authorizing a constable to seize the said copies without warrant and to bring them before the court.

The magistrate was satisfied by the evidence before him that there was reasonable ground for believing that pirated copies of musical works were being so sold at the private house; but he refused to make an order, being of opinion that the Act only applied where the pirated copies were exposed for sale in a public place and did not apply to a private house.

The learned magistrate based his decision on the following grounds: (a) That the wording of the section seemed directed to stopping the sale of pirated works by hawkers in the streets, for which purpose the obtaining of an injunction would be too cumbersome a proceeding; (b) that there were no words in the Act justifying a constable in entering a private house, or a magisteate in making any order which might be so interpreted.

Scrutton, K.C., and Herman Cohen, for the appellants.—The magistrate was wrong, because the Act applies to a private dwelling. If he has not power to grant a search warraut he has certainly power to make an order for the seizure of the pirated copies, leaving it for the constable to execute the order if he were able to do so lawfully.

Daniel Warde, for the owner of the pirated copies.—The magistrate had no authority to make any such order which would authorize a constable to enter a private house and seize without a warrant. The view he took was that such an order could confer no authority on a constable and would therefore either be inoperative or induce the constable to commit an illegal act.

H. Sutton, for the magistrate.—The words "sold or offered for sale" in section 1 are confined to sale in a public place, for the words are: "If satisfied by the evidence that . . . pirated copies . . . are being hawked, carried about, sold, or offered for sale . . ." then the magistrate, on proof that the copies are pirated, may order them to be destroyed or to be delivered up to the owner of the copyright on his application. This appeal should therefore be dismissed, for the view taken by the magistrate is correct.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think this appeal must be allowed. There seems to have been some misunderstanding as to what I said in the case of Ex parte Francis, ante, p. 267, [1903] 1 K. B. 275, which I desire to clear up. I said then that the Act undoubtedly went a very long way in the direction of intertering with the rights of property because by section 2 it permitted a constable to seize this property without a warrant not under an order of a stipendiary magistrate or a court, but at the request in writing of the apparent owner of the copyright or of his authorized agent. It has been erroneously stated, I believe, that the decision in that case has taken away rights which the Act intended to give, because we held that the magistrate had no power under section 2 to order the destruction of copies of pirated music seized by the constable in the street unless the person from whom the copies had been seized was served with a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, in other words, could not make an order for the destruction of the pirated copies on an ex parte application. The decision had certainly not the effect of taking away rights conferred by the Act and it is not right to complain of decisions when the fault arises from the fact that the Act has been drawn up without reference to the established principles of criminal law. Here what we are asked to do is to make an order which would be in effect a search warrant. A search warrant is well known, and powers to grant them are conferred by many statutes, but if persons are minded to get such a warrant they must show clearly that the Act under which they make an application gives jurisdiction to the magistrate to grant the warrant. I do not for a moment suggest that the words "sold or offered for sale" confine the sale to a sale in the street by a hawker; but there is no power given by the statute, on the other hand, to grant a search warrant. In my opinion the case ought to go back to the magistrate with directions to him to issue an order in the terms of the section. I only desire to express a hope that if a new Bill is introduced for the purpose of protecting the owners of musical copyrights that the Bill will be drawn by someone who has a knowledge at least of the elementary elements of criminal law.

WILLS, J., concurred.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the words "sold or offered for sale" in section 1 are not limited to a sale in a public place. On the other point I do not think that the section authorizes the magistrate to issue a search warrant. I agree that the case should go back to the magistrate with an intimation that he should make an order in the terms of section 1.

MOORE, NETTLEFOLD, & CO. v. SINGER & CO (a.)

Distress — Sale — Property in goods distrained — 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2.

A landlord distrained upon premises for rent due, and seized, amongst other articles, a sewing machine which had been hired by the tenant. The goods were sold by auction, and at the sale the machine was bought in by the landlord's agent. The owners of the machine then seized it. In an action for conversion,

Held, that a sale to be valid must be a sale to third parties, and that the buying in by the landlord did not change the property in the sewing machine.

King v. England, 4 B. & S. 782, followed.

Appeal by the defendants, Messrs. Singer & Co., from the decision of his Honour Judge Smyly, sitting at the Birmingham County Court.

The facts of the case are as follows:

A man named Anton was employed by the plaintiffs, and lived in a house belonging to them. He had in his possession a sewing machine, the property of the defendants, which had been lent on the hire system.

In July, 1902, a strike occurred on the plaintiffs' works, and they distrained on Anton's goods for rent due to them.

The sewing machine in question was put up to auction, and was bought by the plaintiffs' manager, who acted as agent for them. The machine was then handed back to Anton on the terms of a hiring agreement.

The defendants, on hearing of what had happened, seized the sewing machine, and the plaintiff thereupon brought this action for conversion.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, on the ground that there had been a bonâ fide sale by the auctioneer.

Young, K.C. (Lawless with him), for the defendants.—The property in this machine was never divested out of the defendants. This case is governed by King v. England, 12 W. R. 308, 4 B. & S. 782. It was there held that a landlord who distrains for rent must sell the goods and cannot retain them at the price mentioned in the inventory. The essence of this contract is a sale, and as the landlord cannot sell to himself the sewing machine still remained the property of the defendants.

Lincoln Reed, for the plaintiffs.—The case of King v. England does not support the proposition of the defendants. Here there was a bonâ fide sale by the auctioneer, and the property therefore passed to the landlord's agent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the principle of King v. England applies to this case. The statute of 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 1, enables the landlord to sell after appraisement. In King v. England Blackburn, J., said, "I think the sale in pursuance of statute 2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2 must be a sale to a third person, otherwise many abuses might arise," and though it is quite correct to say that that expression of opinion is not necessary for the judgment it is a necessary part of the reasoning on which the judgment is based. The statute does not mean that the landlord can go through the form of a sale and take the goods himself. There must be a genuine sale and a transference of the property to a third person. I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The sale was in my view no sale at all. To hold otherwise would be to open the door to obvious abuses. If the landlord was entitled to buy in the goods it would be to his interest to buy them for as small a sum as possible.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree.

HAMPSTEAD CORPORATION v. CAUNT. (a.)

Metropolis—New street—Paving expenses—Liability of owner of premises — Action to recover apportioned amount—Demand—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16)—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 105—Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) s. 77.

By the joint operation of section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 and section 77 of the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act, 1862, which should be be read together, successive owners of houses bounding or abutting on new streets are liable on demand to pay the amount of paving expenses apportioned or charged in respect of their houses, and an action lies for the recovery of such apportioned expenses after demand has been made.

The Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), if applicable, does not begin to run in favour of an owner until payment has been demanded from him.

This case was tried before Wright, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs' claim was for £39 3s. 4d., the defendant's contribution as owner of a house towards the actual cost of repairing the road and paving the footways of a new street called Fleet-mews pursuant to a resolution passed at a meeting of the vestry on the 22nd of July, 1886.

It was admitted that the plaintiffs had incurred expenses in repairing the road and paving the footways of the said new street in 1891, and that £39 3s. 4d. was the proper contribution in respect of 76, Upper Park-road, the defendant's premises, and that he became the owner of those premises on the 20th of November, 1896.

In 1891 a demand for payment was made on the then owner of the premises, but the amount was not paid.

A formal demand was made on the defendant on the 19th of December, 1898, under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as amended by the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act, 1862.

The action was commenced in February, 1903.

By the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, s. 105, it is provided: "In case the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made or hereafter to be laid out or made which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which such street is situate, be desirous of having the same paved as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same . . . and the owners of the houses forming such street shall, on demand, pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement (such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board) and in case such estimated expenses exceed the actual expenses of such paving then the difference between such estimated expenses and such actual expenses shall be repaid by the said vestry or board to the owners of houses by whom the said sum of money has been paid; and in case the said estimated expenses be less than the actual expenses of such paving, then the owners of the said houses shall, on demand, pay to the said vestry or board such further sum of money as, together with the sum already paid, amounts to such actual expenses."

By the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act, 1862, s. 77, which extended the provisions of the above section to vacant plots of land abutting on a new street, it is provided as follows: "Where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by the 105th section of the firstly-recited Act, have paved or be about to pave any new street the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property should they deem it just and expedient so to do; and any such costs or expenses, including the cost of paving at the points of intersection of streets and all other incidental costs and charges, shall be apportioned by the vestry or board, and shall be recoverable either before the work shall be commenced, or during its progress, or after its completion; and it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board at their discretion to accept payment of the amount apportioned or charged in respect of each house or premises by instalments spread over a period not exceeding twenty years, and any such amount shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of the premises either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the vestry or board."

H. Courthope-Munroe, for the plaintiffs.—Section 105 of the Act of 1855 and section 77 of the Act of 1862 must be read together. The effect of so reading them is that the "present or any future owner" of a house or of land forming or abutting on a new street is liable to pay paving expenses upon demand. After demand has been made an action may be brought. Each successive owner becomes liable on becoming owner, and such liability cannot be got rid of. It is a condition precedent to the right to recover that the demand shall be made on the owner or subsequent owner. The Statute of Limitations, if it has any application to this case, does not begin to run until a demand has been made on the owner from whom the amount is claimed, Grece v. Hunt, 25 W. R. 543, 2 Q. B. D. 389. The plaintiffs made their demand on the defendant as soon as they knew of his possession, and the Statute of Limitations, therefore, if applicable, did not begin to run until the date of such knowledge. The Statute of Limitations, however, does not apply to a case like this: Wortley v. Vestry of St. Mary, Islington, 51 J. P. 166.

He also cited Blackburn Corporation v. Saunderson, [1902] 1 K. B. 794, 50 W. R. Dig. 169.

Chester Jones, for the defendant.—It is true a demand must be made under section 105, but it need only be made on the first owner, and once having been made, as in this case, the amount is recoverable from him or any succeeding owner. The liability then becomes a charge on the land: Plumstead Board of Works v. Ingoldby, 21 W. R. 77, L. R. 8 Ex. 63. Each successive owner becomes liable on succeeding to the ownership, and the Statute of Limitations begins to run from such date. In this case the defendant became owner in 1896 and the action was not commenced until more than six years after that date. The remedy against him was therefore already barred when the writ was issued. An action can only be brought under the provisions of section 77 of the Act of 1862, and therefore cannot be brought against the owner of a house who is dealt with by section 105 of the Act of 1855.

paving a new street, apportioned under section 77 of the Act of 1855, are not a charge on the land, but only a personal liability on each successive owner.

Egg v. Blayney, 36 W. R. 893, 21 Q. B. D. 107.

WRIGHT, J.—This is an action brought against the owner of a house to recover the expenses of paving a new street. One question which arises here is whether an action lies at all under section 77 of the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act, 1862, against the owner of a house, or whether the right of action is not confined to the owners of the land as being the parties newly made liable by that section. Another question is whether, presuming an action does lie, the remedy in the present case is barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16). The latter question depends, apparently, on whether it is necessary that a fresh demand should be made upon a person who is a successive owner.

It appears to me that section 105 of the Act of 1855 and section 77 of the Act of 1862 must be read together. The former section says in effect that the owners of houses in the street shall on demand pay to the vestry the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying the pavement. It seems to me to be plain that, as regards the owners of the houses who are liable under that section, no liability exists until the demand has been made, for the reason that the vestry cannot by merely arriving at the result in their own office make an owner liable. The result must be communicated to the owner where it is a matter to be estimated by the vestry's officer. Where the amount has to be estimated by the vestry's officer, it would be ridiculous to suppose that any liability could arise until that estimate had been made and communicated to the owner. Then comes section 77 of the Act of 1862, which says that where paving has been done under section 105 of the Act of 1855, not only the owners of the houses, but "the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property should they deem it just and expedient so to do." Now, stopping there for a moment, it seems to me that I ought to give effect to that provision as if it were read into section 105 of the Act of 1855 as an amendment, which would cover the case of owners of land, and that all the provisions of section 105 ought, so far as they are applicable, to be applied to owners of land who are brought in under section 77, and amongst other things, that the provision requiring a demand ought to be considered as read into that section. Then that section proceeds as follows: "And any costs or expenses, including the cost of paving at the points of intersection of streets, and all other incidental costs and charges shall be apportioned by the vestry or board and shall be recoverable either before the work shall be commenced or during its progress or after its completion, and it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board at their discretion to accept payment of the amount apportioned or charged in respect of each house or premises by instalments," —that seems to me to require that there shall be some demand—"and any such amount shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of the premises either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace." There "such amount" seems to me to mean the amount apportioned or charged in respect of each house or premises, and, if so, the amount apportioned in respect of each house or premises must include amounts apportioned or charged against owners of houses under section 105 as well as amounts apportioned or charged against owners of land under section 77, and, if so, an action can be brought in respect of either amount. I think, therefore, that an action lies, and that, as in my opinion the cause of action was not complete until there was a demand, the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), if it runs at all, does not begin to run until the date of the demand. I think, therefore, there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Probate—Lost will—Contents of draft—Codicil.

The Court declined to grant probate of a draft will which was alleged to be incorporated in a subsequent codicil, or alternatively to the will itself, on the ground that it was not proved that at the time the codicil was executed there was any will in existence.

The plaintiffs were the executors of the deceased, George Lewis Phipps Eyre, a solicitor, who died on the 23rd of February, 1902, and claimed probate of the contents of a will, which in the course of the proceedings was alleged to have been executed by him in or since 1897, but which was now not forthcoming.

Alternatively the plaintiffs claimed that the draft or copy of the will was incorporated in a codicil of the deceased dated the 20th of February, 1902, and was therefore entitled to probate on that ground.

The defendant, Emily Blanche Eyre, who was a daughter of the deceased, prayed for probate of an earlier will of the deceased dated the 10th of February, 1894, with a codicil of the 29th of January, 1898, with or without the will of the 10th of February, 1894.

The intervener, Charles Lewis Eyre, the deceased's heir-at-law, prayed to have all the documents set aside, and claimed an intestacy.

BUCKNILL, J., in delivering judgment, said: In this case the plaintiffs, who sue as executors of George Lewis Phipps Eyre, deceased, claimed to have admitted to probate two documents, being respectively a draft will of 1897, described as document "A," in the pleadings, and a codicil dated the 20th of February, 1902, described as document "B." The claim of the plaintiffs is put alternatively. First, that the document referred to in the codicil of the 20th of February, 1902, as the last will of the deceased was in existence at the time when the deceased executed the codicil, and was never revoked by him, but has been lost, and that its contents appear in the document "A." Secondly, and alternatively, that the document "A" was itself the document referred to in the said codicil and was thereby incorporated and confirmed, and that the two together are the last will of the deceased. The defendant, Emily Blanche Graham Eyre, by her counterclaim sets up a will of the deceased of the 10th of February, 1894, and a codicil thereto of the 29th of January, 1898, and the said codicil of the 20th of February, 1902. Constance Emma Sophia Booker, one of the testator's married daughters, an intervener, also claims to set up the will of 1894, and the codicil of 1898, but not the codicil of the 20th of February, 1902; and another intervener, Charles Lewis Eyre, the heir-at-law of the deceased, claims a declaration that he died intestate. The facts, so far as they are material to the issues raised in this litigation, are as follows: The deceased person, George Lewis Phipps Eyre, made a will dated the 10th of February, 1894, which was duly executed and attested, and on the 29th of January, 1898, he made a codicil to that will, which was also duly executed and attested. The codicil was quite short, and consisted of an appointment of two persons as executors and trustees of his will in the place of those whom he had previously appointed. That codicil was entirely in the handwriting of the deceased. The will of 1894 had been settled by his conveyancing counsel, Mr. Peck, whom the deceased had known for many years, and who had done much of his private business for him. The first draft of that will was resettled by Mr. Peck after consultation with the deceased, and was afterwards finally settled, and engrossed in due course, and executed and attested. On the 4th of February, 1897, the deceased having drawn instructions for another will, Mr. Peck, to whom the draft was submitted, settled a will based on those instructions, and subscribed it thus: "I have settled this draft, and do approve thereof subject to the marginal notes." Although Mr. Peck met the deceased on many subsequent occasions on professional matters, this draft was never again referred to, nor did the deceased mention to him again the subject of his testamentary dispositions. That draft Mr. Peck never saw again until February, 1902, a few days before the testator's death, when it was brought to him by a witness, to whose evidence I shall now refer. On the 3rd of February, 1902, James McGuire, the managing conveyancing clerk to the firm of solicitors of which the deceased was the senior partner, and the confidential clerk of the deceased, was called to his employer's private residence, and was told by him that he wished to consult him about his will. This was the first time he had taken McGuire into his confidence on the subject, although he had often consulted him about other private matters. When McGuire called, the deceased was in bed, with several documents by his side. He then handed to McGuire the papers known in this case as script "A" or the draft will dated 1897, and said, "This is the draft of my will; I want to know whether I have executed my powers under my marriage settlement to the fullest extent." He then asked McGuire to take the draft and consider it. At that time his daughter Constance was married, and it is said that her marriage was against her father's wish. The date of her marriage was in August, 1898, that is, after the codicil of the 29th of January, 1898, and on the 3rd of February, 1902, the deceased told McGuire of his anxiety that her husband should take no benefit in his wife's share under the will of him, the deceased. Another married daughter, Mrs. Tanner, had died between the date of the codicil of 1898, and the 3rd of February, 1902, but her name was not then mentioned. McGuire took away the draft will, and, having carefully considered it, went on the 13th of February to see the deceased to discuss it with him; but he was too unwell to attend to business, and an appointment was made for the next day. On McGuire's inspection of the draft between the 3rd and the 13th of February, he saw that it was a very incomplete document. It bore no date except the year 1897; the attestation clause was incomplete It had a number of marginal notes, some by Mr. Peck, and some in the handwriting of the deceased. His daughter Constance was still referred to by her maiden name, and Mrs. Tanner was still mentioned as if she were alive; the age of a child called Millicent Aileen Moore had been altered in the deceased's hand in such a way as to show that he had done it so late as in 1900. There were blank places where sums of money should have been inserted. The word "out" in the handwriting of the deceased was found in the margin in several places, referring beyond doubt to parts of the draft that he at some time intended to alter, and reference was made by him in the draft to some notes which he had made on another paper. In fact, the document was in such a condition when McGuire first went through it alone that he concluded at once it was no more than an incomplete draft; and on the 14th of February he told the deceased so, whose reply was that he had executed a will, by which McGuire understood that a will duly executed was then or had been in existence of which the draft in question was the basis, so, to use his own expression, he dropped the subject, as the deceased was a very masterful man, and he accepted his statement that there was such a will, and that the deceased wished by a codicil to alter some of its provisions if so advised. The draft of 1897 was then discussed, not point by point exactly, but on those parts of it about which the deceased wished to speak, and he then asked McGuire to see Mr. Peck and take his opinion on any points on which he, McGuire, was doubtful, and the interview ended. Mr. Peck was consulted on the 18th, and he wrote an opinion on the 19th, which McGuire took at once to the deceased and read to him, and asked him if he wished to act on it, and he said he did. The same draft was then gone through again and each point of importance discussed, McGuire taking notes on the back of Mr. Peck's opinion. Some of the points discussed were not settled and remained open. On the 28th of February McGuire called again, but the deceased was too ill to attend to the matter; and from a statement made by the nurse who was in attendance on him, McGuire went to his own house and then and there drew a codicil to what he believed to be the last will of the deceased—that is, he drew a codicil to a document, the existence of which the deceased had vouched and which McGuire assumed was a will based on the draft which he and the deceased had examined and discussed on the 3rd and 19th of February. If such a will ever existed, it is almost impossible to suppose that the draft which McGuire saw, in the condition in which he saw it, could have been a copy of it. About ten o'clock of that night Mr. McGuire saw the testator again, and told him he had prepared a codicil to his will and read it through to him, and the testator then said that it expressed his wishes. Mr. McGuire then suggested that the deceased should execute the draft forthwith, and that when he had made up his mind on those points about which he was still undecided, he could have it re-engrossed and executed as a complete codicil. The deceased asked why he should execute it then, saying that there was no hurry; but McGuire made some remark about the shortness of life, when the old man drew himself on to his elbow and executed the codicil, saying, "This is a codicil to my last will." McGuire and the nurse executed it. I have already said that the codicil was drawn up and executed in peculiar circumstances, and I have my own view as to the wisdom of McGuire's action on that day. I must say that I should not, in the circumstances, have acted exactly as he did. After the codicil was executed and attested the testator put it under his pillow, and McGuire left and went home and wrote out a short statement of what had occurred. On the 23rd of February the testator died. At the trial it was admitted that he was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the codicil. Of the language of the codicil it is only necessary to make one remark. Not knowing the date of the will of which the draft of 1897 was taken by McGuire to be the basis, because the draft itself had no precise date, the codicil made reference only to a last will of the testator, and wherever reference is made in it to a will, the only will referred to was that which McGuire believed to be in existence and of which he had accepted the draft of 1897 as the basis. He stated in answer to a question of the learned counsel for the defendants that the codicil which he drew was intended to be a codicil to a will he had not seen, and he added that it was so intended by the testator beyond a doubt. It was also admitted by McGuire that it was never the intention of the testator that a fresh will should be drawn; also that so far as he was able to gather from the conversations he had with the testator, he had no intention of the draft of 1897 being set up as a will by the codicil. Both of them had in their minds another document. Two questions and answers in the cross-examination of McGuire make this clear. "Q.—So far as you could gather from your conversation with him, he had no intention of setting up this draft as a will, because there was already a will according to him? Ans.—Yes. Q.—That being so, you did not trouble about all the doubts and queries there were expressed upon this draft, neither did he? Ans.—That is just it. I considered there was a will, certainly." On the facts of this case, so far as I am able to judge, I find myself obliged to come to the conclusion that there never existed either a valid or an invalid will based on the draft of 1897. Except the statement made by the deceased on 14th of February, all the facts go to disprove its existence. The fact that Mr. Peck only settled the one incomplete draft, and that his queries on it were never answered, and that he never had the subject mentioned to him again by the testator, although he saw him afterwards on many occasions on professional business; the condition of the draft of the 3rd of February, 1902; the absence of any evidence of the engrossment of such a will and the failure to find it—all these matters go to satisfy me that the testator never went further than (using an expression of counsel) to tinker at this draft from time to time and over a long period. He had evidently an idea in 1897 of making such a will, but in 1898 he made a codicil in his own hand, which is some evidence that he had either changed his mind about a new will or that he had the subject still under consideration. It is most probable that when he told McGuire on the 14th of February that he had executed such a will he believed it, but the conclusion to which I come is that his memory played him false. He was of a great age, and his bodily health was failing, and perhaps to a certain extent his memory also; although, for the purposes of a testamentary disposition, it is not denied that his intellect was clear and good. This draft had been in existence for nearly five years; and it bears on its face, as I have already said, traces of having been considered and altered so late as in 1900. It is, of course, possible that the deceased had made a valid will subsequently to the codicil of 1898, and based on the draft of 1897, and that some of the alterations now appearing on that draft of 1897 were made at a still later period than the will itself; but there is no evidence on the point. It is all in the dark. I cannot accept the statement of the deceased to McGuire that there ever was a duly executed will such as that of which he spoke. In the case of Atkinson v. Morris, [1897] P., at p. 48, Lord Russell of Killowen stated the rule very clearly. He said: "There is no case to be found which goes the length of saying that statements made by a testator to the effect that he has executed a will are admissible evidence in substitution for the proper and regular evidence of the fact of the execution of the will conformably to and with the formalities enjoined by the Wills Act." As I cannot accept the statement of the deceased to McGuire that he had executed such a will because it is not evidence, I cannot accept the draft of 1897 as a copy of a supposed will that is said, but not proved, to have been lost. I now proceed to consider the codicil of the 19th of February, 1902, drafted by McGuire in somewhat exceptional circumstances, and duly signed by the testator, and attested by McGuire and the nurse late at night on the same day and within a few hours of its preparation, and when the deceased was extremely ill. It recites the death of the testator's daughter, Lucy Tanner, and the marriage of his daughter, Constance, since the date of his last will. The deceased then proceeds to exercise a power of appointment under his first marriage settlement in favour of the children of his said deceased daughter, taking care to provide that in the event of any part of the provision so made for the children of Mrs. Tanner coming eventually to his daughters, Constance Booker or Emily Blanche Graham Eyre, it should be held upon the trusts under the will of the testator to which the codicil was supposed to make reference—that is, the will based on the draft of 1897. The words in the codicil, "upon the trusts under my will," are inapplicable to the will of 1894. They referred to a will supposed to be based on the draft of 1897, because Mr. McGuire, who drafted the codicil, had not heard of any other will. The testator then revoked a legacy of £100 and a bequest of a carriage clock given by his said will to his daughter, Constance, and in lieu thereof left her a legacy of £25; and he then proceeded to deal with the share of his residuary estate by his said will given to or in trust for his daughter, Constance, in language which it is said could not refer to the will of 1894, but which did refer to the supposed will of which the draft of 1897 is said to be the basis. If this is so, can this codicil stand as a valid testamentary paper? The question must be answered before the alternative claim of the plaintiffs can be established. In my judgment it is not for me to say now that, because I cannot read the whole codicil with the will of 1894, this codicil may not have an independent existence. As Lord Penzance said, in In the Goods of Turner, 2 P. & D. 403, at p. 405, "It is said there is a difficulty in this case because by reason of the will having been destroyed the codicil in great part is unintelligible. It seems to me that difficulty has no bearing upon the question whether this codicil shall be admitted to probate. The same difficulty applies in every case where some other document is mentioned in a will in such manner that the directions of the will cannot be carried out without a reference to such document and that document is not forthcoming. It is a question of construction which another court can only decide." I am of opinion that this codicil of the 20th of February, 1902, which has been made in every way comformably to the statutory requirements, must be admitted to probate. Being a valid testamentary document, the next question is whether the draft of 1897, Script A., can be read into that codicil so as to give effect to what is said to have been the intention of the testator. In my opinion it is not competent to me to do so. As I have already said, the evidence compels me to find that both McGuire and the deceased referred to a will, not to a draft will, and certainly not to an incomplete draft such as this so-called draft of 1897. The testator looked on the codicil of the 20th of February, 1902, as a codicil to an existing will; but I have no doubt that if McGuire had known then what I hold now to be the real state of the facts—that is, that there was no proof that the testator had executed such a will, or that there was never any other testamentary paper than the draft of 1897 except the will of 1894 and the codicil of 1898—he would have taken care that the codicil was properly worded so that the draft of 1897 should have been incorporated, provided, of course, that he satisfied himself that such was the wish of the deceased. It is said on the plaintiff's behalf that In the Goods of Mercer is in point. There the deceased had executed a will dated the 7th of November, 1865, which he left deposited in a bank in India. On the 21st of August, 1869, being in this country, he executed a codicil to his "last will, dated the 7th of November, 1865," and which he confirmed except in so far as altered by the codicil. He told one of his executors that his will was deposited at the bank in India, and he gave him a copy of it which he said was correct, and at the foot of that copy he wrote, "This is a copy of my last will and testament referred to in the codicil signed by me this 19th day of August, 1869." In fact no codicil was executed by the deceased on that date, and the copy of the will was not duly executed. The court (Lord Penzance) found there was such a will in India and that there was a copy of it, although not duly executed; but he also found that the codicil referred to and confirmed the copy of the will; and he granted, therefore, probate of it as incorporated in the codicil. That case is not like this. There the court found that there was a will in existence when the codicil was made, and it also found that the alleged copy of the will was in fact a copy; but here I find that there was no will, and I also find that this draft is not even proved to be a copy of what the testator said was a will based upon it. In In the Goods of Elizabeth Watkins, 1 P. & D., at p. 20, Sir J. P Wilde said: "Before this motion can be granted two propositions must be established, neither of which can be established in this case. First, it must be made manifest that the testatrix in the executed paper referred to some papers then in existence; and, next, that the papers in question are beyond all doubt the papers referred to." In my judgment the plaintiff's claim fails. I now come to the counter-claim of the defendant, who seeks by it to set up the will of the 10th of February, 1894, the codicil thereto of the 29th of January, 1898, and the codicil of the 20th of February, 1902. That will and those codicils were duly executed and attested and were never revoked. There is no doubt that the testator never intended to revoke the last codicil, and as to the codicil of 1898 and the will of 1894, there is no evidence of revocation except as appears in the draft of 1897, with which I have already dealt, and the statement by the testator that he had executed a will based on that draft, which point I have also dealt with. The result of this litigation is that I declare in favour of the will of 1894, the codicil of 1898, and the fresh codicil of 1902. Costs of all parties allowed out of the estate.

ACT OF PARLIAMENT:—

Taxing Act—Meaning—Effect of continuous user.—No amount of subsequent user will control the plain meaning of an Act of Parliament; but, where the meaning is not plain, a continuous user, extending over many years, may be called in aid to show what the true meaning is.—CORPORATION OF DUBLIN v. TRINITY COLLEGE, H.L.; 88 L. T. 305.

See also Power, 6.

ADEMPTION:—

1. Double portions—Presumption—Advances to sons—Inter vivos—Gifts for temporary purposes.—A gift to a child by a parent, who has already by his will provided for such child, of a large sum in the interval between the date of his will and the date of his death primâ facie raises a presumption that the gift is to be taken by way of partial ademption, as coming within the rule against double portion. But all the circumstances of the case must be looked at, and the presumption is rebutted if it appears that the gift was made with the intention of affording mere temporary assistance to the child and not of permanently establishing him in life, according to the rule laid down by Jessel, M.R., in Taylor v. Taylor, 23 W. R. 719, L. R. 20 Eq. 155.

So far as Taylor v. Taylor conflicts with Boyd v. Boyd, 15 W. R. 1071, L. R. 4 Eq. 305, and Blockley v. Blockley, 33 W. R. 777, 29 Ch. D. 240, Taylor v. Taylor is to be preferred.—SCOTT, RE, LANGTON v. SCOTT, C.A., 182; [1903] 1 Ch. 1; 72 L. J. Ch. 20; 87 L. T. 574.

2. Will—General legacy—Particular purpose—By his will, made in 1898, a testator gave "to the trustees of the endowment fund of the C. Hospital, S., £10,000." He subsequently—namely, in 1900—sent a cheque for this amount accompanied by a letter to these trustees, and died shortly after.

Held, that parol evidence was admissible to show that the particular purpose of the legacy had been satisfied by the gift, and that the legacy was thereby adeemed.—CORBETT, RE, CORBETT v. COBHAM, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 326; 88 L. T. 591.

3. Will—Purchase of house and land for legatee by testator in his lifetime—Codicil directing advances or moneys lent to be brought into hotchpot—Construction — Presumption against double portions. — A testator by his will gave one-third of his residuary estate to a daughter, who afterwards married. By a codicil, made after the marriage, the testator directed the amount of all "advances or moneys lent" by him to the daughter or her husband, or either of them, to be brought into hotchpot. Shortly after making the codicil the testator purchased a house and some land, which were conveyed by his direction to the daughter and her husband respectively.

Held, that these did not constitute "advances" within the meaning of the codicil. The law relating to the presumption against double portions based on Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Bro. Ch. C. 555, has not been changed by In re Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 81.

Observations of North, J., in In re Vickers, 36 W. R. 545, 37 Ch. D. 525, on the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in In re Lawes disapproved.

See Will, 34.

ADMINISTRATION:

1. Annuities—Insufficient income—Direction in will for payment out of corpus—Abatement—Hotchpot—Distribution.— A testator charged his estate with the payment of annuities to certain persons for life, with remainders over to other persons, and directed that if the income derived from his estate was insufficient to pay the annuities in full, money should be raised for the purpose on mortgage of his real estate. It was ascertained some time after the testator's death that the income was insufficient, and money was consequently raised as directed.

Held, on the distribution, that the annuitants in possession who had received sums of money out of corpus were not liable to bring these sums into hotchpot.

Potts v. Smith, 17 W. R. 1083, L. R. 8 Eq 683, followed.—METCALF, RE, METCALF v. BLENCOWE, Ch.D.Farwell, J., 650; 88 L. T. 727.

2. Debts—Marshalling assets—Real estate charged with debts—Pecuniary legatees and specific devisees — Where a testator directs his debts to be paid and so charges them on his real estate, and also gives pecuniary legacies, the pecuniary legatees are entitled to have the assets marshalled as against the specific devisees of the realty.

In re Bate, Bate v. Bate, 43 Ch. D. 600, 38 W. R. Dig. 6, disapproved.

In re Stokes, 67 L. T. Rep. 223 41 W. R Dig. 3, and In re Salt, 43 W. R. 500, [1895] 2 Ch. 293, followed.— ROBERTS, RE, ROBERTS v. ROBERTS, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 89; [1902] 2 Ch. 834; 72 L. J. Ch. 38; 87 L. T. 523.

3. Grant—Next-of-kin lunatic - Grant to committee —Official solicitor committee—Sureties dispensed with. —The court will dispense with sureties altogether on a grant of letters of administration, taking only the bond of the principal, upon sufficient ground being shown.—EMILY JANE UNWIN, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; 87 L. T. 749.

4. Intestacy — Administrator's oath — Applicant's belief as to being sole next-of-kin—Practice.—It is not the practice of the court to presume death under any circumstances. It merely gives the applicant for letters of administration, or other applicant, leave to swear the death, and the applicant has to swear to the fact.—SARAH JANE JACKSON, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; 87 L. T. 747.

5. Intestacy—Pedigree—No official record—Evidence.—In the absence of any official record of the marriage of the parents of an intestate the court accepted, as primâ facie evidence of such marriage, a statement which was contained in an extract from a Scottish marriage register, dated in 1868, on the marriage of a brother of the intestate. The names and description of both the parents of the bridegroom appeared in the register under the heading "Name, surname, and rank or profession of father." —WIGLEY v. SOLICITOR TO THE TREASURY, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 233; 71 L. J. P. 115; 87 L. T. 745.

See Distributions, Statute of, 1; Probate 1, 3, 8.

ADULTERATION—

1. Brandy—Sufficiency of analyst's certificate.— Brandy having been analyzed, the certificate stated: "I am of opinion that the said sample contained parts as under, or the percentages of foreign ingredients as under: It has been reduced from 25 degrees under proof to 27·6 degrees under proof."

Held, that the certificate was sufficient.—FINDLEY v. HAAS, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 465.

2. Compounded drug—Analyst's certificate—Decomposition.—Vinegar of squills prepared according to the British Pharmacopœia has as one of its constituents a certain proportion of acetic acid, but the British Pharmacopœia does not prescribe how much acetic acid should be present in the compounded drug. Even if properly kept, a change or decomposition takes places in the drug which reduces the quantity of acetic acid. The justices were of opinion that there is a standard for the quantity of acetic acid which should be present in vinegar of squills resulting from its preparation as directed by the British Pharmacopœia, and that, having regard to the deficiency in acetic acid, howsoever arising, the drug sold was not composed of the ingredients in such proportions as that demanded by the purchaser, and was to his prejudice.

Held, that the justices were wrong, as there was no evidence that the purchaser in asking for vinegar of squills demanded the proportion of acetic acid that would be present in new vinegar of squills, and that the hypothetical standard set up by them could not be supported.

Semble, that vinegar of squills being liable to decomposition, the analyst ought to append a note to his certificate in the statutory form, stating whether any change had taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis.

Quære, whether this omission could be cured by the vivâ voce evidence of the analyst.—HUDSON v. BRIDGE, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 550.

3. Evidence—Article sold not in accordance with prescription in British Pharmacopœia—Evidence of commercial standard different from Pharmacopœia—Admissibility of evidence —In a prosecution under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, upon the ground that the article, being one mentioned in the British Pharmacopœia, is not in accordance with the prescription in the Pharmacopœia. Evidence tendered for the defendant is admissible to show that there is a commercial standard of the article different from that prescribed by the British Pharmacopœia. —BOOTS CASH CHEMISTS (LIMITED) v. COWLING, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 539.

4. Food—Butter—Margarine—Substance with more than 10 per cent. of butter fat.—Butter blended with milk so that it contains an excess of water does not become margarine. Therefore a vendor of such milk-blended butter cannot be convicted under section 8 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, for selling margarine containing more than 10 per cent. of butter fat. The sale of butter blended with milk is lawful if sold as such.—BAYLEY v. PEARKS, GUNSTON, & TEE, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 67.

5. Food—Butter—Notice in shop—Notice on wrapper—Label—Protection of seller by notice on wrapper delivered with article.—To a purchaser who went into a shop and asked for half a pound of best fresh butter the seller sold butter which was found to be adulterated by the addition of water, and which was in fact milk-blended butter containing an excess of water. There was hung in a conspicuous place in the shop a notice that all butter sold in the shop was milk-blended butter, and the butter when handed to the purchaser was wrapped up in a paper wrapper on which was printed a notice that the butter was choicest butter blended with milk, whereby the percentage of water in it was increased. Upon an information against the seller under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling butter which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the butter demanded, the justices found that the sale was to the prejudice of the purchaser, but that the seller was protected by section 8 of the Act by reason of the notice in the shop, and by reason that the butter was wrapped in a printed notice disclosing the fact that the article was a mixture, but there was no finding by them as to whether the notice on the wrapper could or could not be seen by an ordinary purchaser.

Held, that the notice on the wrapper was a sufficient notice by label within section 8, and was a good defence under that section, and that the justices were right in dismissing the information.—HAYES v. RULE, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 133.

6. Food—Milk—Inspector—Sample taken by inspector at a place outside his district—Certificate given by analyst of inspector's district—Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 12, 13, 21; and 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.—By the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, it was necessary that there should have been a sale or a contemplated sale of the milk of which samples were taken by an inspector under the Act within his district, and he was only authorized to take samples at the place of sale.

By section 3 of the subsequent Act of 1879 an inspector was authorized "to procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee of such milk."

Held, that the magistrate was right in refusing to convict the respondent of selling milk found on analysis to contain 21 per cent. of added water, on the ground that the sample had been taken compulsorily by the inspector at a place outside his district, and that in doing so he had acted beyond his powers.—MCNAIR v. CAVE, K.B.D., 112; [1903] 1 K. B. 24; 72 L. J. K. B. 26; 87 L. T. 680.

7. Food—Warranty—Contract by letters—Label—Verbal contract—Notice.—The C. P. D. Co. (Limited), by a contract in writing, agreed to buy pure new milk with all its cream, each churn to bear a written warranty. To each churn was attached a label: "Warranted pure new milk with all its cream delivered under contract." The company also verbally agreed to buy milk, and that a written warranty should be given with each consignment in the form of a label. To a churn delivered under that agreement was attached a label: "Warranted pure new milk with all its cream." Prosecutions having been instituted against the company under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, notice was given on their behalf under section 20 (1) of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, and copies of the labels were inclosed. It was found by the magistrate that all the requirements of section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, had been complied with, and he discharged the company from the prosecutions for selling milk not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser, such milk being delivered in pursuance of these contracts.

Held, that the magistrate was right.

Semble, that a contract to give a written warranty need not be in writing.—IRVING v. CALLOW PARK DAIRY CO., K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 70.

8. Food—Warranty—Terms of agreement—"Without accepting any responsibility after delivery"—Validity.—The addition of the words "but without accepting any responsibility after delivery" do not affect a warranty so as to make it unavailable as a defence under section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.—WILSON v. PLAYLE, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 554.

9. Practice—Time for return of summons—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 19, sub-section 2.—By section 19, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, it is provided that "In any prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts the summons . . . shall not be made returnable in less time than fourteen days from the day on which it is served."

Held, that fourteen clear days must elapse between the date of service and that of return.—MCQUEEN v. JACKSON, K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. B. 163; 72 L. J. K B. 606; 88 L. T. 871.

AGREEMENT.—See Contract.

ANIMAL:—

Shooting at dog trespassing—No intention to kill—Illtreating and abusing—Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 2.—Shooting at a dog that is trespassing without intending to kill it, but with the intention of injuring it if necessary to frighten it away, is not of necessity cruelly illtreating it. Each case is a question of degree and is for the justices.—ARMSTRONG v. MITCHELL, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 870.

See Criminal Law, 6.

APPEAL:—

1. Costs, Appeal against—Competency of appeal.—The House of Lords will not entertain an appeal against costs only.

Appeal against a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Sessions, Scotland (1902) 40 S. L. R. 50. dismissed.—CALEDONIAN RAILWAY CO. v. BARRIE, H.L.; [1903] A. C. 126.

2. Security for costs—Appeal under Workmen's Compensation Act—Execution stayed by county court judge.—An order for security for the costs of an appeal under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, will be ordered in a proper case even if the county court judge has stayed execution with a view to an appeal.—SHEA v. DROLENVAUX, C.A.; 88 L. T. 679.

ARBITRATION:—

1. Staying proceedings — Engineer of council referee to determine mode of performance of contract—Power to dismiss contractors and their workmen—Implication of law that these powers should not be put in force until the arbitrators had affirmed the judgment of the engineer—Injunction.—On a motion to restrain the defendants from acting on a notice given by them or their engineer pursuant to a contract between plaintiffs and defendants from entering on or taking possession of works in course of execution under such contract and for damages, it appeared that the defendants were carrying out a scheme for a water supply, and had contracted with the plaintiffs to sink certain wells. The work was to be performed to the satisfaction of the defendants' engineer, and any dispute was to go to arbitration, and if, in the judgment of the engineer, sufficient despatch was not used the council or their engineer might dismiss the contractors and their workmen. Difficulties having arisen in carrying out the work, and delay being thereby occasioned, the council gave notice dismissing the contractors and their men.

Held, that the terms of the contract were consistent as a whole, and that the reference to arbitration was engrafted upon them, and that the contractors were not bound to give up to the engineer the decision of every question. That the court ought to imply that the defendants would not act upon the summary clauses until the arbitrators had affirmed the judgment of the engineer. Injunction granted accordingly to preserve the status quo until trial or an award should be made. — FOSTER v. BOROUGH OF HASTINGS, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 87 L. T. 736.

2. Staying proceedings—Submission of disputes under contract to jurisdiction of foreign courts—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 4, 27. —A policy of life insurance, effected on the life of a foreigner with an English company, contained a condition that for all disputes which might arise out of the contract of insurance, all the parties interested expressly agreed to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts of Budapest having jurisdiction in such matters.

Held, that this was a submission of all disputes under the contract to the courts at Budapest within sections 4 and 27 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and that an action on the policy in England would be stayed.—AUSTRIAN LLOYD STEAMSHIP CO. v. GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, C.A., 402; [1903] 1 K. B. 249; 72 L. J. K. B. 211; 88 L. T. 6.

3. Summons for directions—Agreement to refer to arbitration—Legal proceedings—Application for stay —Step in proceedings—Practice—Arbitration Act, 1899 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 4—R S. C., 1883, ord. 30, r. 4.—Attendance by a defendant before the master on a summons for directions, taken out by the plaintiff, and acquiescence, without protest, in a common form order for delivery of pleadings, is taking a step in the proceedings within the meaning of section 4 of the Arbitration Act (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), and the defendant is thereby precluded from moving to stay proceedings under that section.

County Theatres and Hotels (Limited) v. Knowles, [1902] 1 K. B. 480, must be taken to lay down a general rule.—RICHARDSON v. LE MAITRE, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 222; 88 L. T. 626.

ASSIGNMENT:—

1. Chose in action—Contract to sell reversionary interest—Assignment by purchaser of benefit of contract—Right of assignee to sue vendor for breach—"Legal chose in action"—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66) s. 25, sub-section 6.—The defendant contracted to sell his reversionary interest in property to R., who by deed assigned his interest under the contract to the plaintiff, and notice in writing of the assignment was duly given to the defendant. The defendant after the assignment to the plaintiff refused to perform his contract.

Held, that the assignment was an assignment of a "legal chose in action" within section 25, subsection 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that the plaintiff was entitled to sue the defendant for damages for the breach of contract.—TORRINGTON v. MAGEE, K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 427; 71 L. J. K. B. 712; 87 L. T. 304.

Reversed on the facts: [1903] 1 K. B. 644.

2. Equitable assignment—Reversionary interest—Stop order—Notice—Priority.—A Jewish lady who was entitled to a reversionary interest in a fund in court after the death of her mother, married a Moorish Jew in Morocco, and signed a marriage contract under which it was alleged that according to Jewish custom her children became entitled to the fund on her death, to the exclusion of the husband. The children obtained no stop order on the fund. The wife died before her mother; and after her death her husband as her administrator assigned the fund to assignees, who obtained a stop order on the fund in court with notice of the marriage, but without notice of the title of the children. After the mother's death the assignees claimed the fund.

Held, that by obtaining a stop order on the fund from the lady's legal personal representative the assignees became entitled to the fund in priority to the children.

In re Freshfield's Trust, 11 Ch. D. 198, considered and followed.—MONTEFIORE v. GUKDALLA, C.A.; [1903] 2 Ch. 27; 72 L. J. Ch. 442; 88 L. T. 496.

3. Letter assigning proceeds of sale of goods—Notice to creditor — Bankruptcy of assignor — Revocation by trustee in bankruptcy — Validity of assignment.—A firm, being indebted to the plaintiffs for the price of goods sold, shipped a quantity of copper ores to the defendants for sale, and wrote instructing them, after payment of a certain account out of the proceeds, to pay the balance to the plaintiffs. On the same day the firm wrote to the plaintiffs advising them of the shipment of the ores to the defendants, and stating that they had instructed them to pay such balance to the plaintiffs. The firm having become bankrupt, their trustee revoked the instructions contained in their letter to the defendants.

Held, that, notwithstanding such revocation, the letters constituted a good equitable assignment to the plaintiffs of the balance of the proceeds of the goods.—ALEXANDER v. STEINHARDT, WALKER, & CO, K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. B. 208; 72 L. J. K. B. 490.

Debtor—Committal for default to obey an order for the payment of money—Release of debtor by mistake—Second order for attachment—Re-arrest—One year's imprisonment—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4.—A debtor had, under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, been sentenced to imprisonment under a writ of attachment for default in payment of a sum of money in his hands which he had been ordered by the court to pay. Before the expiration of one year—the period limited for imprisonment by the section—he was released owing to a mistake by the governor of the prison.

Held, that attachment under section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, was in its nature punishment for an "offence," and, consequently, that there was no jurisdiction to issue a second writ of attachment against the debtor in respect of the same default.

Semble, an order for re-arrest might have been made under the original writ of attachment, but in that case the time during which the debtor had been at large should be included in the period of the twelve months' imprisonment limited by the section.—CHURCH'S TRUSTEE v. HIBBARD, C.A., 293; [1902] 2 Ch. 784; 72 L. J. Ch. 46; 87 L. T. 412.

See Solicitor, 1.

BAILMENT:—

Carriage lent to bailee—Damage to carriage by servant of bailee not in course of his employment—Liability of bailee for damage.—The plaintiff, a coach-builder, lent the defendant a dog-cart whilst he repaired the defendant's trap. The bailee's servant, not acting in the course of his employment, negligently injured the lent dog-cart by driving it into a tram-car.

Held, that the bailor could recover damages from the bailee for the injury to the dog-cart.

Coupé Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413, 40 W. R. Dig. 11, followed.—SAUNDERSON v. COLLINS, K.B.D., 558.

See Contract, 4.

BANKER:—

1. Bill of exchange—Cheque—Crossed cheque—Receipt of payment for customer—Agent for collection—Crediting customer in account—Cheque crossed by banker—Draft by branch bank on head office—Conversion—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 82—Stamp Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 55), s. 19.—The protection afforded to bankers by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, who in good faith and without negligence receive payment for a customer of crossed cheques, is conferred only where the bankers act as mere agents for collection. If they do more than act as such agents as where they forthwith credit the customer with the face value of the cheque, they are collecting the money for themselves, and are not protected by the section. Cheques to be "crossed cheques" within the section must be crossed on receipt by the bankers and not afterwards made so. A draft addressed by a branch manager to the head office is not a bill of exchange within the Act of 1882, but the bankers are entitled to the protection of section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1853.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 276, [1902] 1 K. B. 242) affirmed, with a variation.—CAPITAL AND COUNTIES BANK v. GORDON, H.L., 671; [1903] A. C. 240; 72 L. J. K. B. 451; 88 L. T. 574.

2. Cheque—Certification—Fraudulent alteration of amount—Negligence—Notice to bank giving credit—Mistake of facts—Actual knowledge.—A cheque for a specified sum drawn upon the Bank of H. was certified by that bank, but was afterwards fraudulently altered by the drawer to a larger amount than that for which originally drawn and certified, and was paid by him into his account at another bank, which gave him credit for the larger amount and passed the cheque so altered through the clearing house in the usual way, and obtained payment thereof from the Bank of H. The Bank of H. were not actually aware of the fraud at the time of payment, but ascertained it from their books next day, when they required repayment of the increase from the other bank.

Held, that as the money was honestly paid by the Bank of H. under a mistake of facts, it could be recovered back, there being no negligence or want of notice to prejudice this right.—IMPERIAL BANK OF CANADA v. BANK OF HAMILTON, P.C., 289; [1903] A. C. 49; 72 L. J. P. C. 1; 87 L. T. 457.

3. Customer—Mistake—Money paid under mistake of fact.—The defendants, who were foreign bankers, were in the habit of making advances to K., who then purchased goods which the defendants held as security; when K. found a purchaser he assigned the right to receive the purchase-money to the defendants, who accordingly released the goods. K. also carried on the same system with B. & Co. The plaintiffs bought from K. two parcels, the one released by the defendants and the other by B. & Co. K. instructed the plaintiffs to pay the defendants and B. & Co. respectively for the goods so purchased. By mistake the plaintiffs paid both sums to the defendants, who credited K.'s account, notifying K of their having done so. The defendants acting bonâ fide continued to make advances to K., who knew of the mistake, but did not disclose it, and afterwards became bankrupt. The plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants the sum which should have been paid to B. & Co. as money paid under mistake of fact.

Held, that the defendants were holding the money to the use of the plaintiffs, and that as the defendants were not prejudiced by such payment the sum was recoverable as money paid under mistake of fact.—CONTINENTAL CAOUTCHOUC, &c., Co. v. KLEINTWORT, K.B.D., 541.

4. Customer—Transfer from one account to another—Trust—Notice—Inquiry—Suspicion.—In the absence of circumstances which disclose a trust a banker is entitled to set off what is due to a customer on one account against what is due from him on another account, although the moneys due to him may in fact belong to other persons.

A managing director of a company who was the holder of all the shares of the company carried on a similar business to that of the company on his own account, and the bankers were the same. It was known that his intention was to work the two businesses together. On three occasions he transferred large sums by cheque from the company's account to his own, and this was done in breach of his duty as a director.

Held, that, as under the circumstances there was no notice to the bank of any irregularity, or anything which should lead to an investigation or inquiry, the bank were not liable to refund to the company the sums transferred.—BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES v. GOULBURN VALLEY CO., P.C., 367; [1902] A. BANKRUPTCY:—

1. Bankruptcy notice—Company—Winding up—Liquidator—Judgment for unpaid calls—Set-off—Application to set aside bankruptcy notice—When set- off must be effective—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).—To enable an application by a debtor to set aside a bankruptcy notice which has been served on him by a judgment creditor to succeed, the debtor must show that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross-demand which can be set up by him at the time of the application to set aside the bankruptcy notice, and not merely one which can be subsequently set up in the bankruptcy so as to put an end to any effective claim by the judgment creditor for the amount of his judgment. There is no general principle that a bankruptcy notice should not be issued in respect of a debt if on bankruptcy that debt would be discharged by a set-off.—A DEBTOR, RE, C.A., 675.

2. Bond—Arrest of debtor—Bond to enforce debtor's attendance for examination — Default of debtor—Forfeiture of bond—Whether Crown or creditors entitled to proceeds of bond—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 25—Form of bond.—Where a debtor, who has been arrested under section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for failing to attend his examination, gives a bond with sureties to obtain his release from prison, the proceeds of the bond, if it is subsequently forfeited, will go as a general rule, not to the Crown, but to the creditors, subject to any order the court may make in any special case.

In future the bond is to be given to the senior registrar in bankruptcy for the time being.—GORDON, RE, SALMOND, RE, Bkcy.; [1903] 2 K. B. 164; 72 L. J. K. B. 587.

3. Costs of prosecution—Fraudulent debtor—Prosecution by trustee—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, sub-section 3; ss. 16, 17—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 57, sub-section 3; s. 166.—A trustee who prosecutes a debtor for offences committed against the bankruptcy laws without first obtaining an order of the court for that purpose under section 16 of the Debtors Act, 1869, will not, as a general rule, be allowed the costs of the prosecution out of the estate, even although the prosecution was expressly sanctioned by the committee of inspection.—HOWES, RE, WHITE, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; [1902] 2 K. B. 290; 71 L. J. K. B. 705.

4. Costs of solicitors to trustee—"Realizing assets"—"Costs of petitioner"—Re-hearing and appeal—Priorities.—The "taxed costs of the petitioner" payable under rule 125 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, will include the costs of a re-hearing of the petition and an appeal therefrom, and will be payable according to the rule in priority to the general disbursements of a trustee, other than those actually incurred in realizing the assets of the debtor.—BRIGHT, RE, WINGFIELD & BLEW, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; [1903] 1 K. B. 735; 72 L. J. K. B. 287.

5. Discharge—Subsequent scheme of composition involving annulment of bankruptcy—Discretion of court as to annulment — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 23, 32—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), ss. 8, 9.—The court, in exercising its discretion as to the annulment of a bankruptcy, will take into consideration not only the interest of creditors but also and primarily the interests of the public and commercial morality.

A bankrupt who had obtained a discharge entered into a scheme of composition with his creditors one of the conditions of which was that the bankruptcy should be annulled. The bankrupt had been guilty of certain offences under the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 8.

Held, that in the interests of public and commercial morality the court was precluded from ordering the bankruptcy to be annulled.—BEER, RE, BEER, EX PARTE, C.A., 422; [1903] 1 K. B. 628; 72 L. J. K. B. 366; 88 L. T. 334.

6. Execution—Payment to creditor—Withdrawal of sheriff—Bankruptcy of debtor—Completion of execution—Title of trustee.—An execution is not completed by payment direct to an execution creditor.—POLLOCK AND PENDLE, RE, WILSON, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; 87 L. T. 238.

7. Execution—Sheriff's fees—Possession of goods by sheriff with consent of judgment debtor and creditor—Receiving order — Right against official receiver to possession money after twenty-one days.—A sheriff levied execution on the 13th of March, and, instead of selling, remained in possession for seventy-eight days at the joint request of the creditor and the debtor. On the 16th of May a receiving order was made against the debtor, and on the 28th of May the official receiver required the sheriff to withdraw.

Held, that, as possession by the sheriff for twenty-one days constituted an act of bankruptcy to which the title of the trustee related back, the sheriff was only entitled, as against the trustee, to possession money for twenty-one days. — ENGLISH AND AYLING, RE, Bkcy.; [1903] 1 K. B. 680; 72 L. J. K. B. 248; 88 L. T. 127.

8. Extradition—Property found on bankrupt at date of arrest—Retention by police—Claim by trustee in bankruptcy—Evidence of crime—Order for delivery up of property—"Competent authority" to make order—Belgian Extradition Treaty, 1876, art. 12—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 10.—The police magistrate who orders the extradition of a prisoner to Belgium is "the competent authority" to order the delivery of the property found upon the prisoner to the Belgian authorities under article 12 of the Belgian Extradition Treaty, 1876 (Hertslet's Treaties, vol. 14, p. 172). — BOROVSKY & WEINBAUM, RE, SALAMAN, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; 48; [1902] 2 K. B. 312; 71 L. J. K. B. 992; 87 L. T. 184.

9. Jurisdiction—Foreigner "ordinarily resident"—Hotel—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6, sub-section 1 (d).—A foreigner who, for purposes of litigation, has stayed in England at hotels during nine months of the year immediately preceding the date of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, has "ordinarily resided" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 6, sub-section 1 (d).—BRIGHT (CHARLES), RE, BRIGHT, EX PARTE, C.A., 342.

10. Mortgage—Life policy—Assignment of life policies by way of mortgage—Notice of assignment—Priority of claims of mortgagees.—The bankrupt before his bankruptcy executed a mortgage of life policies in favour of a client whose money he had misappropriated, but never disclosed the fact. He subsequently gave another mortgage on the same policies to a person who gave notice thereof to the insurance companies prior to the bankruptcy. After the bankruptcy the first mortgage was discovered, and the mortgagee at once gave notice of it to the insurance companies.

Held, that the second mortgagee was entitled to priority, having been the first to give notice, although the first mortgagee had not been guilty of laches.

Foster v. Cockerell, 9 Bligh N. S. 332, followed.—LAKE, RE, CAVENDISH, EX PARTE, Bkcy., 319; [1903] 1 K. B. 151; 72 L. J. K. B. 117; 87 L. T. 655.

11. Mortgage reserving right of consolidation—Subsequent mortgages of same property—Third mortgage including other property—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 17.—The provisions of section 17 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enabling a mortgagor to redeem one mortgage without redeeming other mortgages made by him, only applies where there are several mortgages on different properties of the same mortgagor.

Where a first mortgage contains a proviso excluding the operation of section 17, that proviso is to be applied to subsequent mortgages by the same mortgagor, though they may not contain similar provisions.—SALMON, RE. THE TRUSTEE, EX PARTE, Bkcy., 288; [1903] 1 K. B. 147; 72 L. J. K. B. 125; 87 L. T. 654.

12. Notice—Judgment creditor—Security given to satisfaction of creditor—Right to issue second bankruptcy notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).—A creditor having obtained a judgment against a debtor issued a bankruptcy notice on it, but subsequently entered into an agreement with the debtor by which the latter gave certain property by way of security, part of which property he was to be at liberty for a year from the date of the agreement to repurchase. Six months after the agreement the creditor issued a second bankruptcy notice in respect of the debt against the debtor, on which a receiving order was made.

Held, that the creditor had no right to issue the second notice while the option to repurchase existed.—SMITH, RE, DURBAN, EX PARTE, C.A., 118; [1903] 1 K. B. 33; 72 L. J. K. B. 30; 87 L. T. 586.

13. Proceedings taken in name of official receiver—Taxation—Remission to allow official receiver to be represented.—A litigant was allowed to take proceedings in the name of the official receiver. They were unsuccessful, and costs were given against the official receiver. The indemnity given by the litigant proved to be insufficient. No notice of taxation was given to the official receiver, and he was unrepresented except by the solicitor for the litigant.

Held, that the bill ought to be remitted for retaxation.—DILLON, RE, OFFICIAL RECEIVER, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; 88 L. T. 127.

14. Proof—Security—Breach of trust—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II.—Where a trustee of a settlement has invested funds of the settlement upon an unauthorized security and subsequently becomes bankrupt, a proof against his estate for the amount of the funds so invested will not be admitted, unless the creditor proving is in a position to hand over the security on which they were invested to the trustee.

15. Proof—Substitution of proof by assignee of proving creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 58, 63.—The assignee of a proof who desires to take the benefit thereof, after satisfying the official receiver or trustee of the validity of the assignment, should apply to the court to give leave to the official receiver to place a proof by him (the assignee) on the file in place of the proof of the assignor.—ILIFF, RE, Bkcy., 80.

16. Property of bankrupt—After-acquired property—Contract of employment—Dismissal after bankruptcy—Action by bankrupt for wrongful dismissal—Right of action vesting in trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.—The plaintiff entered the employment of the defendants for a term of years as a traveller at a salary. During the period of employment he was adjudicated bankrupt, and subsequently the defendants dismissed him. In an action for wrongful dismissal, he being at the time an undischarged bankrupt,

Held, that, the breach of the contract of employment having occurred after the bankruptcy, the cause of action did not vest in the plaintiff's trustee in bankruptcy, who had not intervened in any way, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to sue in his own name.

It is not sufficient for the debtor by himself to carry out part of the scheme, and then to come to the court to get its sanction as to the balance of the scheme.

BASTARDY—

1. Evidence of mother — Corroborated in some material particular.—In corroboration of the evidence of the mother, who was a servant to the appellant's grandfather, in an application for an order against the appellant under section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), evidence was given that the appellant and respondent were seen "out together evenings in the lanes," and that after the birth of the child the appellant asked if the respondent "was going to swear the child."

Held (dissentiente Wills, J.), that this was corroboration in some material particular to satisfy section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872.—HARVEY v. ANNING, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 687.

2 Poor law—Illegitimate child becoming chargeable —Marriage of mother—Power of guardians to obtain order against putative father—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 9), s. 5.—It is competent for the magistrates, at the instance of the poor law guardians, to make an order against the putative father of an illegitimate child who has become chargeable to the union, ordering him to contribute to its support, notwithstanding that the mother of the child has a husband who is able to support it.—PLYMOUTH UNION v. GIBBS, K.B.D., 157; [1903] 1 K. The document also contained, at the end of it, the following clause: "No time given to or security taken from or composition or arrangement entered into with either party hereto shall prejudice the rights of the holder to proceed against any other party."

Held, that the document was a good promissory note within the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and was not invalidated by reason of the clause at the end of it.

BILL OF SALE:—

1. Hiring and purchase agreement—Intention of parties to agreement—Inference to be drawn from facts —Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 3, 9.—The owner of an hotel contracted with a purchaser for the sale of the hotel, and the chattels therein, for a lump sum. The purchaser, being short of a portion of the purchase-money, applied to the defendants for a loan on mortgage, which was refused; but it was arranged that the defendants should offer to purchase the chattels, and their offer was accepted and the money paid to the vendor. The defendants then entered into an agreement with the purchaser of the hotel for the hiring and purchase by instalments by him of the chattels, and this agreement contained a license to seize the chattels on certain defaults being made. The purchase of the hotel was then completed, and the purchaser entered and carried on the business. Subsequently the defendants seized the chattels on a default being made. The purchaser became bankrupt, and his trustee claimed the chattels, and brought this action to recover them. The learned judge before whom the case came decided that the true inference from the facts was that the money paid by the defendants was a loan to the purchaser of the hotel to enable him to complete the purchase, and that the hire-purchase agreement was a security for that loan, and was void for want of registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. On appeal, Held, that there was evidence to support the conclusion that the defendants had advanced the money by way of a loan upon the security of the hire-purchase agreement, and that, as the only claim of the defendants to the chattels arose under that agreement, which was void for want of registration as a bill of sale, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.—MELLOR'S TRUSTEE v MAAS, C.A.; [1903] 1 K. B. 226; 72 L. J. K. B. 82; 88 L. T. 50.

2. Registration—Omissions in copy—Signature of grantor and attesting witness—Affidavit—Form—Covenant to replace worn-out articles—Term for maintenance of security—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict c. 31), s 10, sub-section 2—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict c. 43) s. 9, Schedule—Practice—Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction—Appeal from Liverpool Court of Passage—Application for new trial of interpleader issue—Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 37), s. 10.—The copy of a bill of sale filed on registration in pursuance of section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, omitted the signature of the grantor and the signature, address, and description of the attesting witness. The affidavit filed with the copy stated that the bill of sale was duly executed by the grantor, and that the execution thereof was witnessed by the attesting witness, and gave the name, address, and description of the attesting witness.

Held (affirming Thomas v. Roberts, [1898] 1 Q. B. 657, 46 W. R. Dig. 19), that the bill of sale was not rendered invalid by the omissions in the filed copy, as they might be supplied by reference to the affidavit.

A bill of sale contained a covenant by the grantor that he would not, without the consent of the grantee, assign or underlet any of the chattels thereby assigned, or remove them except for necessary repairs, and would replace such of them as should be worn out by other articles of equal value.

Held (following Seed v. Bradley, 42 W. R. 257, [1894] 1 Q. B. 319), that this covenant was merely for the maintenance of the security, and did not constitute a deviation from the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

The Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to entertain an application for a new trial of an interpleader issue tried in the Liverpool Court of Passage.—COATES v. MOORE, C.A., 648; [1903] 2 K. B. 140; 72 L. J. K. B. 539.

3. Sums repayable by instalments—Denomination of money in monthly payments omitted—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9—Form in schedule, Deviation from—Validity.—A bill of sale, given to secure the repayment of an advance of £70 and interest at the rate of 1s. per month, stated that the grantor agreed to pay to the grantee "the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by monthly instalments of seven (sic) on the 25th day of every month succeeding the date of these presents."

The Court was of opinion that an irresistible inference arose from the language of the instrument that the missing word was "pounds."

Held, therefore, that the bill of sale was valid as being substantially in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act.—MOURMAND v. LE CLAIR, K.B.D., 589; [1903] 2 K. B. 216; 72 L. J. K. B. 496; 88 L. T. 738.

CANADA, LAW of:—

1. Action, Cause of—Insolvency of debtor—Civil Code of Lower Canada, art. 1092.—Under art. 1092 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada an action to recover the balance of purchase-money of land may be brought although the time for payment has not arrived when the debtor has become insolvent or has diminished the value of the security. —KENSINGTON LAND CO. v. CANADA INDUSTRIAL CO., P.C.; [1903] A. C. 213; 72 L. J. P. C. 66; 88 L. T. 711.

2. Adjacent owners—Injury by works on land—Damages—Right of action.—The appellant and the respondents were owners of adjacent pieces of land. The respondents demised their land to B. under an agreement to sell, and B. took possession of the land and executed some works on it for his own benefit as an intending purchaser, and not for or by the direction of the respondents. The effect of such works was injurious to the appellant's land.

Held, that the appellant had no right of action against the respondents for damages for the nuisance to his land, and could not compel them to abate such nuisance.—KIEFFER v. LE SEMINAIRE DE QUEBEC, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 85; 72 L. J. P. C. 18; 87 L. T. 484.

3. Common School Fund—Arbitration—Jurisdiction of arbitrators.—Questions between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec as to the distribution of money in the hands of the Government, Ontario belonging to the "Common School Fund" of the two Provinces, were referred to arbitrators appointed under statute.

Held, that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to entertain a claim of the nature of damages against the Ontario Government in respect of money belonging to the fund which it was alleged that they had wilfully neglected or omitted to collect.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR ONTARIO v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR QUEBEC, P.C.; [1903] A. 4. Company—Liquidator—Canadian Winding-up Act, 1886, ss. 15 and 31—Restricted power of liquidators of bank to sue in their own names—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 516 and 521—Power to amend by adding bank as plaintiffs.—Under the Canadian Winding-up Act, 1886, ss. 15 and 31, a company in liquidation retains its corporate powers including the power to sue, although such powers must be exercised through the liquidator under the authority of the court. The liquidator must sue in his own name or in that of the company, according to the nature of the action; in his own name where he acts as representative of creditors and contributories; in that of the company to recover either its debts or its property.

Where liquidators sued in their own name to recover a debt due to the company,

Held, that the error was one of form, which the court had power to give leave to amend under sections 516 and 521 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant having admitted the debt and pleaded set-off, and not having excepted to the form of the action, leave to amend should have been given in the sound exercise of judicial discretion.—KENT v. LA COMMUNAUTE DES SŒURS DE CHARITE DE LA PROVIDENCE, P.C.; [1903] A. 5. Indian reserves—Proprietary right of province—Acquiescence by officers.—By section 91, sub-section 24, of the British North America Act, 1867, the Parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative authority over "Indians and lands reserved for Indians."

Held, that this did not vest in the Dominion Government any proprietary rights in such lands in infringement of the proprietary rights of the Province in which such lands are situated under section 109 of the Act, and therefore in the case of lands which had been reserved for Indians and subsequently surrendered by them to the Crown, the title of grantees claiming under the Provincial Government must prevail over that of grantees claiming under the Dominion Government. A Provincial Government cannot be bound by alleged acts of acquiescence on the part of their officers not authorized or adopted by the Government.—ONTARIO MINING CO. v. SEYBOLD, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 73; 72 L. J. P. C. 5; 87 L. T. 449.

6. Patent—Expiry of patent—British patent a foreign patent—Canadian Patent Act (R. S. O., c. 61, s. 8)—55 & 56 Vict. c. 24, s. 1—Construction.—By the true construction of section 8 of the Canadian Patent Act, c. 61 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, as amended by Canadian Act 55 & 56 Vict. c. 24, s. 1, a Canadian patent expires as soon as any foreign patent for the same invention existing at any time during the continuance of the Canadian patent expires. A British patent is a foreign patent within the meaning of the Canadian Patent Act.—DOMINION COTTON MILLS CO. v. GENERAL ENGINEERING CO. OF ONTARIO, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 570; 71 L. J. P. 7. Practice as to concurrent findings—Avoidance of gifts made by testator—Civil Code, art. 762.—Where there are concurrent findings of fact as to a testator's competence and freedom from undue influence,

Held, that they will not be disturbed unless it be made plain that there has been a miscarriage of justice, or at least that the evidence has not been adequately weighed or considered:

Held, also, that gifts made by the testator to the respondent during his lifetime would not be avoided under art. 762 of the Civil Code where there was neither allegation nor evidence that they were made in expectation of death. The proviso in the article "unless circumstances tend to render them valid," requires that those circumstances should be investigated. — ARCHAMBAULT v. ARCHAMBAULT, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 575; 71 L. 8. Rights of Dominion and Province—Right of naturalized alien to franchise.—The British North America Act, 1867, s. 91, sub-section 25, places the subject of "naturalization and aliens" under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. By section 92 the Provincial Legislature have the exclusive right of dealing with the constitutions of the Provinces. By the Naturalization Act (Rev. Stat. Can. c. 113), s. 15, naturalized aliens are "entitled to political and other rights, powers, and privileges" to which natural-born British subjects are entitled. By the Provincial Elections Act of 1897 the Legislature of the Province of British Columbia enacted that aliens of certain races, whether naturalized or not, should not be entitled to be registered as voters.

Held, that naturalization did not necessarily give an inherent right to vote, and that the Provincial Elections Act, being an Act dealing with the Constitution of the Province, was not ultra vires.—CUNNINGHAM v. TOMEY HOMMA, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 151; 72 L. J. P. C. 23; 87 L. T. 572.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, LAW of:—

1. Act IX. of 1858, s. 11—Construction—Claim to take land for railway—Compensation.—It is a sound canon of construction that an intention to take away property without compensation should not be imputed to a Legislature unless it be expressed in unequivocal terms. Section 11 of Act IX. of 1858 must receive a strict construction.—PUBLIC WORKS COMMISSIONER v. LOGAN, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 355; 88 L. T. 779.

2. Real property—Prohibition of alienation—Mortgage—Validity.—By the Roman-Dutch law of the Cape of Good Hope, where real property is vested in any person subject to a prohibition against its alienation, either by act inter vivos or by will, to any person not a member of the family of the settlor:

Held, that a mortgage, being a mere charge not passing the dominium, is not a breach of the prohibition, and is therefore not invalid.—JOSEF v. MULDER, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 190; 72 L. J. P. C. 50; 88 L. T. 72.

CARRIER:—

1. Common carrier—Inherent unfitness of thing to be carried—Damage arising from—Liability of carriers.—The defendants, as common carriers, contracted with the plaintiff to carry for him an engine from his yard to a neighbouring town on the defendants' railway. The engine was on wheels and fitted with shafts to allow of its being drawn by horses. While the defendants were drawing the engine with their horses to the railway station one of the shafts, owing to its being rotten, broke; the horses took fright and upset the engine, which was damaged. The defective condition of the shaft was not known to either the plaintiff or the defendants, and could not have been discovered by any ordinary examination.

Held, that as the engine was not in fact fit to be carried in the way in which it was intended to be carried, and the damage resulted in consequence of that unfitness, the defendants were excused.—LISTER v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO., K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. B. 878; 72 L. J. K. B. 385; 88 L. T. 561.

2. Lighterage—Negligence of lighterman—Barring clause—Duty of exercising reasonable skill and care—Loss or damage coverable by insurance.—A contract by the defendants to lighter a cargo contained the following clause: "The rates charged by us are for conveyance only, and we will not be liable for any loss of or damage to goods which can be covered by insurance. The terms of the marine or other policy should stipulate that insurance is effected without recourse to lighterman. We will not be responsible for any consequences arising from strikes or other labour disturbances."

A barge which was being used in carrying out the said contract was left moored to a jetty, and, owing to the negligence of the lighterman, became jammed under a projecting part of the jetty, resulting in a sinking of the barge and a loss of the plaintiffs' cargo.

Held, that although a carrier could by contract exempt himself and his servants from liability for negligence, yet he must use some express, plain, and unambiguous terms to express that intention, and that mere general words will not exempt a carrier from using reasonable skill and care.

Held, further, that the above clause meant that the defendants undertook no liability as insurers, but did not exempt them from the obligation of using reasonable care and skill; and consequently that the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of the cargo.—PRICE & CO. v. UNION LIGHTERAGE CO., K.B.D., 477; [1903] 1 K. CEYLON, LAW of:—

1. Arbitration—Right of party to withdraw—Misconduct of arbitrator.—Under the Civil Procedure Code of Ceylon an arbitration in an action is a judicial proceeding in which the court acts by an arbitrator; and where a judicial order of reference in a pending action has been granted on the joint application of the parties neither party is entitled to withdraw from it. Where a party to such an order of reference gave notice to the arbitrator, before his first sitting, that he withdrew from the arbitration, and the arbitrator, after notice to the party withdrawing, proceeded with the reference, and made his award:

Held, that proceeding with the reference ex parte was not "misconduct of the arbitrator" within section 691 of the Civil Procedure Code, and that the award could not be set aside on that ground.—AITKEN v. FERNANDO, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 200; 72 L. J. P. C. 63; 88 L. T. 179.

2. Practice — Special leave — Appeal in forma pauperis.—Where a Colonial Code made no provision for appeals in formâ pauperis, and it was contended that the case was as regards amount, value, and nature fit to be taken in appeal, special leave was, under the circumstances of the case, granted.—PONAMMA v. ARUMOGAM, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 561; 71 L. J. P. C. 121.

CHANNEL ISLANDS, LAW of:—

Guernsey—Title to right of way by the public—Grant—Effect of delay in suing after attaining majority.—In the Channel Islands, where the doctrine of dedication to the public is unknown (1) title to a right of way must be made out by the public as by a private individual, by either grant or prescription; (2) a grant must be matter of record; and, quære, whether prescription will avail without proof of title:

Held, in an action by the appellant to have it determined that the public had no right of way over his property, that a registered minute of a resolution of the Seigneur and resident tenants of the Island of Sark, where it was situated, which did not duly record a completed transaction of grant, being rather a note of an unaccepted offer, was neither in form nor effect sufficient to create a title in the public.

Held, also, that a minor is not required to bring an action of title within a year of his majority.—GODFRAY v. CONSTABLES OF SARK, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 534; 71 L. J. P. C. 116; 87 L. T. 3.

CHARGING ORDER:—

Practice—Shares—Power to order sale—Judgments Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110), s. 14—Ord. 46, r 1—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Action to enforce charging order—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).—Where a judgment creditor has obtained a charging order under section 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838, upon shares in a company standing in the name of the judgment debtor, the court has no power to make an order for the sale of the shares in the original action, but a separate action must be brought for that purpose.

Leggott v. Western, 32 W. R. 460, 12 Q. B. D. 287, approved.

Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) does not apply to the case of an action to enforce a charging order obtained under section 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838, and consequently leave cannot be granted to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction in such an action.

CHARITY:—

1. Bequest to be applied "in charity or works of public utility"—Uncertainty—Bequest "for the benefit or hospitality" of a company.—A testator bequeathed to the company of C. and the company of A. the sum of £5,000 each, to be invested in such securities as the master and court of assistants of such companies might select, the revenue to be expended at the option of the master and court of such companies, as to two-thirds in "charity or works of public utility," and as to the remaining one-third for "the benefit or hospitality of the respective companies."

Held, that "or" was used disjunctively, and that the whole of the two-thirds might be applied for purposes which were not charitable, and therefore that the gift failed as to two-thirds.

But, held, the gift of one-third was a gift of income for the absolute benefit of the companies, and that they were absolutely entitled to one-third.—LANGHAM v. PETERSON, Ch D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 87 L. T 744.

2. Disposition—Trustees—Scheme by court or sign-manual.—Where a testator gives property to trustees on general charitable trusts, but indicates no definite objects, the proper mode of carrying out the objects of the testator is by a scheme of court and not by sign-manual.—PYNE, RE, LILLEY v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 283; [1903] 1 Ch. 83; 72 L. J. Ch. 72; 87 L. T. 730.

3. Gift for charitable purposes—Failure of particular application—Cy-près doctrine—Practice—Impeachment of settlement by defendant.—Where there is an immediate gift for charitable purposes, such gift is not rendered invalid by the fact that the particular application directed cannot immediately, or will not of necessity, take effect within any definite limit of time, and may never take effect at all. In 1848 certain natives of New Zealand gave land to the then bishop as a site for a college, and in 1850 the gift was confirmed by a Crown grant. The land was afterwards conveyed to trustees, but no college was built on it, and it was let for grazing purposes, and the rents and profits were accumulated and invested. In 1897, it appearing that from changes in the population the site was no longer a suitable one for such college as was originally contemplated, the trustees applied to the court for a scheme for the administration of the trust.

Held, that, there being a general purpose of charity, the funds and lands were subject to administration by or under the direction of the court cy-près, and had not reverted to the Crown. It is not consistent with the practice of the court in such matters that the defendant in an action for the administration of the trusts of a settlement, not void upon the face of it, should be permitted to impeach the settlement in his defence to the action. Such course must be taken directly either by action or counter claim.—WALLIS v. SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR NEW ZEALAND, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 173; 72 L J. P. C. 37; 88 L. T. 65.

4. Mortmain—Gift to charity of interest and remainder in impure personalty—Change of investment to pure personalty before falling into possession—Failure of gift.—By his will, made in 1889, a testator gave to a charity property, including his interest in remainder, expectant on the determination of his parents' life interests, in the trust funds comprised in their marriage settlement. He died in 1890. At the date both of his will and of his death £500, part of the trust funds, was properly invested on mortgage of real estate; but in 1902, when the life interests determined, the £500 had been called in, and was represented by a sum of Consols.

Held, that as regards the £500, the testator was disposing of an interest in land, although his interest was in remainder, and that the gift to the charity therefore failed as regards this sum.—PRICHARD'S SETTLEMENT, RE, PLAYNE v. TWISDEN, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 88 L. T. 197.

5. Mortmain—Will—Terminable interest of real estate—Tenant for life—Consent—Mortmain—Vesting—Official trustee of charity lands—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), ss. 3, 5, 6.—A testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale, but directed that no part of his freeholds and leaseholds should be sold during the life of his widow without her consent; and, subject to certain legacies and annuities, he gave one-fourth of the income of his estate to his widow and the remaining three-fourths to certain charities. The widow was alive and had not consented to a sale, and more than a year had elapsed since the testator's death.

Held, that the will gave two interests to the charities: (1) a reversionary interest expectant on the widow's death in the proceeds of sale of land, and this was not land within the meaning of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891; (2) a terminable interest in the income of land, which the trustees were expressly forbidden to sell during the lifetime of the widow without her consent in writing, and this was land which, not having been sold within the year, had vested in the Official Trustee of Charity Lands.—RYLAND, RE, ROPER v. RYLAND, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 345; [1903] 1 Ch. 467; 72 L. J. Ch. 277; 88 L. T. 456.

6. Roman Catholic school—Sale with the consent of "bishop for the time being"—Persons "absolutely entitled"—Charity Commissioners—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 69—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.—Trustees of buildings used as a Roman Catholic school who have power, with the consent of the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese for the time being, to sell the premises and give receipt for purchase-money, are persons "absolutely entitled" under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 69, to receive payment out, of the purchase-money for such premises paid into court under the said Act; and the consent of the Charity Commissioners to such payment out is not required. —SHEFFIELD CORPORATION AND ST. CLUB—

1. Absence of express power to alter rules—Power of majority to bind minority—"General purposes" of club—Power to increase subscription.—In the absence of an express power to alter its rules, a club has no inherent authority to increase the annual subscription provided for by the rules, against the wishes of a dissentient minority of its members.—HARRINGTON v. SENDALL, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 463; [1903] 1 Ch. 921; 72 L. J. Ch. 396; 88 L. T. 323.

2. Trustee—Indemnity—Position of members of club.—It is an implied, but fundamental, condition in the constitution of every ordinary club that the members thereof incur, as such, no liability to pay anything beyond their subscriptions as members, either to the club funds or to anyone else.

Consequently, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary in the rules of the club, the members of an ordinary club are not personally liable as such, to indemnify the trustees of the club against liabilities incurred by the latter as such trustees.

But the respondent ought to have notice of the evidence intended to be used against him, and if the party moving omits to furnish him with copies of such exhibits as are necessary to enable him to know fairly the nature of this evidence, the applicant will be liable to have the motion dismissed.—CARTER v. 2. Creditors of company—Debenture-holders—Scheme for composition—Agreement—Registration—Deed of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), ss. 4, 5, 7, 8, 16.—The Deed of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), does not apply to limited companies, and consequently an agreement by a limited company for composition with its creditors is not void for want of registration. In a case where most of the creditors who had notice had signed or assented to an agreement by a company for a composition, it was held, under the circumstances of the case, that all creditors, who desired so to do, were at liberty to take the benefit of the agreement.—RILEY'S (LIMITED), RE, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 681.

3. Debentures—Covering deed before 1900—Specifically mortgaged property—Property acquired after 1900 upon trusts of covering deed—Assignment to company—Sub-demise to the trustees—Registration of charge—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.—Trustees for the debenture-holders of a limited company were empowered by their trust deed, which was executed in 1897, to sell certain property therein specifically mortgaged, and were to hold the proceeds of sale upon trust (amongst other things) at the request of the company to purchase or acquire leasehold hereditaments, which were to be held upon the trusts of the specifically mortgaged property. The trustees having £2,700 in their hands upon the above trusts, and the company desiring to acquire a certain public-house, obtained themselves in March, 1902, a demise of the house for £2,700 for 1,001½ years; and then, in consideration of £2,700 received from the trustees in August, 1902, the company sub-demised the house to them for the whole term except the last day.

Held, that the sub-demise of August, 1902, was a specific mortgage or charge upon the public-house under section 14, sub-section 1, of the Companies Act, 1900, and must be registered under its provisions.—CORNBROOK BREWERY v. LAW DEBENTURE CORPORATION, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 508; 72 L. J. Ch. 496; 88 L. T. 722.

4. Debentures—"Floating charge"—Priority—Unregistered floating charge void against creditors—

Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14 (1) (d).—A company incorporated under the Companies Acts, which had previously issued debenture stock secured by a floating charge upon the assets of the company, proceeded in 1902 to assign the book and other debts then owing, and also all future book and other debts, by way of mortgage to secure guarantors of the company's overdraft at their bankers from liability in respect of their guarantee.

It appeared from provisions in the mortgage deed that it was not intended to thereby prevent the company from continuing to trade or collect outstanding debts, although the guarantors had power to intervene at any time, upon a majority of them considering it desirable.

Clause 21 of the debenture trust deed contained a provision allowing the company "to sell or specifically mortgage or charge or otherwise deal with and dispose of the property and assets expressed to be charged by way of floating security or any part thereof."

Held, that the charge created by the mortgage deed was a "floating charge" within the meaning of that expression, as used in section 14 (1) (d) of the Companies Act, 1900; and that it was void as against creditors inasmuch as it was not registered as required by that sub-section.

Decision of Farwell, J. (ante, p. 537), affirmed.—YORKSHIRE WOOLCOMBERS' ASSOCIATION, RE, C.A.; [1903] 2 Ch. 284; 72 L. J. Ch. 635; 88 L. T. 811.

5. Debentures—Registration—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.—The registration under sub-section 4 of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, of the particulars therein mentioned protects the whole of the series of debentures in respect of which such registration is effected, at whatever time such debentures are issued, provided they be not issued more than twenty-one days before such registration.

The meaning of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, discussed.—HARROGATE ESTATES (LIMITED), RE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 334; [1903] 1 Ch. 498; 72 L. J. Ch. 313; 88 L. T. 82.

6. Debentures—Registration—Extension of time—Winding up before registration—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), ss. 14, 15.—An order was made under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, extending the time for registering a charge created by a trust deed on certain debentures until a date fourteen days after the making of the order, but "without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such trust deed and debentures shall be actually registered." Ten days after the order was made the company passed a resolution for voluntary winding up. On the fourteenth day after the order was made the charge was duly registered.

Such registration held not to make the debenture-holders secured creditors as against the general body of creditors, whose rights were protected by the form of the order.—ANGLO-ORIENTAL CARPET CO., RE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 634; [1903] 1 Ch. 914; 72 L. J. Ch. 458; 88 L. T. 391.

8. Debenture-holder's action—Sale by order of court—Purchase-money in court—Trustees' remuneration.—Trustees for the debenture-holders who by the terms of their trust deed are entitled to remuneration, to be paid by the company, are not, in the absence of express provision in the trust deed, entitled to be paid such remuneration in priority to the debenture-holders, out of proceeds paid into court of a sale of the mortgaged property, in a debenture-holder's action.—ACCLES (LIMITED), RE, HODGSON v. ACCLES, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 57.

9. Director—Disqualification—Clause validating the acts of de facto directors.—No. 108 of the articles of a company provided that all acts done at any meeting of the directors, or by any person acting as such director, should, notwithstanding that it should afterwards be discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such director or person acting as aforesaid, or that they or any of them were disqualified, be valid, as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director. It was also provided that two directors should form a quorum, and that a director who accepted or held any office under the company, other than that of managing director, was to vacate office as director.

B., a director of the company, was elected secretary of the company, but subsequently resigned the office. At board meetings, subsequent to the resignation, at which B. and only one director were present, various business was transacted, such as the election of directors.

Held, that the acts done by B. in his capacity of a director were validated by clause 108 in the articles of association.—BRITISH ASBESTOS CO. v. BOYD, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 667; 88 L. T. 763.

10. Director — Qualification shares — Acting as director—Implied agreement to take shares—Reasonable time to obtain qualification—"Ceases to hold his qualification"—Qualification of director raised by resolution of company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 23, 37—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s 3.—By the articles of association of a company the qualification of a director was the holding in his own right of £50 in shares of the company. The plaintiff, who was a director, held this number of shares. Subsequently the directors resolved that a resolution should be put to the shareholders at the next general meeting that the qualification of a director should be the holding of 250 £1 shares in the company. At the general meeting resolutions were passed for increasing the capital of the company and altering the articles of association by raising the qualification of a director as above. This resolution was duly confirmed, and a prospectus was issued which the plaintiff signed and in which his name appeared as a director. The plaintiff was present at all the meetings. After the resolutions had been confirmed, and before the issue of the prospectus, the secretary and manager of the company, without the plaintiff's knowledge, entered the plaintiff's name on the register for 200 shares, making in all the requisite 250 shares. The plaintiff subsequently sent in his resignation as a director. Upon a counterclaim for calls in respect of the 200 shares,

Held, (1) that the plaintiff had not "ceased to hold his qualification" within the meaning of section 3, sub-section 2, of the Companies Act, 1900, when the qualification of a director was raised, and that therefore his office was not thus vacated; and (2) that, as the plaintiff had accepted the office of and had acted as a director after he knew of the increase in the qualification, he must be taken to have contracted with the company that he would obtain the requisite shares within a reasonable time, and that he ought to have obtained the shares before signing the prospectus; and that, therefore, his name had been properly placed on the register, and he was liable for the calls.—MOLINEAUX v. LONDON, BIRMINGHAM, AND MANCHESTER INSURANCE CO., C.A., 36; [1902] 2 K. 11. Directors—Prosecution—Payment of costs out of assets—Refusal of public prosecutor to prosecute—Discretion—Winding up of company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 167.—In order to determine whether leave ought to be given to institute criminal proceedings against the director of a company which is being wound up, and whether the costs of the prosecution ought to be paid out of the assets of the company, the court will look at the question from the point of view of an individual, and will consider whether it would be the duty of a good citizen even at a loss to himself to institute and carry on proceedings to punish the criminal. It is not necessary to find that the facts are so plain that a conviction must ensue. The proportion of creditors who support and oppose the application, and the effect which will be produced upon the estate by payment of costs, will be taken into consideration, but not the personal advantage of the individual, nor motives of vengeance against the offender, nor pecuniary benefits to be obtained for the creditors or shareholders. The fact that the law officers of the Crown have refused to allow the public prosecutor to undertake the prosecution is not necessarily revelant.—LONDON AND GLOBE FINANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED), RE, *Ch.D. 12. Directors — Purchase of shares — Fiduciary position—Negotiation of sale of undertaking—Duty to disclose.—The fiduciary relations which exist between partners do not apply as between directors of an incorporated company and other individual shareholders, even after negotiations for the sale of the company's undertaking have arisen. A person buying or selling shares in a company, of which he is a director, is under no obligation to disclose matters which have come within his knowledge as a director, whether such matters have arisen in the ordinary course of the company's business or relate to a contemplated sale of the company's undertaking.—PERCIVAL v. WRIGHT, *Ch.D. 13. Promotion—Secret profit—Fiduciary relationship—Prospectus—Non-disclosure— Misrepresentation —Damages.—A company bought two music halls, the conveyance being taken to a nominee of the company who afterwards executed a declaration of trust in favour of the company. He then purported to resell the halls at a greatly enhanced price to another nominee of the company as a trustee for another company not yet formed, which was intended to work the halls. The original purchase price was paid and the purchase price on the resale received by the first company, which settled the memorandum and articles of the second company, and registered it, and nominated the signatories to its memorandum and most of its directors, one of whom was a director of the first company. The prospectus of the second company represented the nominee of the first company as vendor of the halls, concealing the interest of the first company in them, and contained material misrepresentations.

Held, on the evidence, that the first company bought the halls with the intention of reselling them to the second company at an inflated price; that it promoted the second company; that the prospectus of the second company was issued with the knowledge and privity of the first company; and that the first company therefore stood in a fiduciary relation to the future allottees of shares in the second company, and was liable for the damage sustained by that company through the breach of duty and fraud of the first company.

14. Prospectus—Contract by company—Omission from prospectus—Rights to be "honourably met"—Cancelled contract—Materiality—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131). s. 38—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3.—A promoter in May, 1898, agreed to float a company for a sum of £20,000. Shortly after the company was incorporated it was resolved to purchase the business of another company as a going concern, and the buying company in September, 1898, entered into a contract with the promoter by which the promoter agreed to advance a sum of £14,250 by way of deposit on the purchase-money. The company, by a contract contained in a letter of the 21st of September, 1898, agreed to repay this deposit if the purchase went through, and further agreed to pay a bonus of £7,500 in consideration of the promoter's additional services. The agreement of purchase was signed on the 26th of September, 1898. The directors of the vendor company, some of whom were to join the board of the new company, objected to the payment of the £7,500. Consequently, on the 10th of October, 1898, an agreement was come to whereby the contract of the 21st of September was cancelled, and the promoter was satisfied with an assurance that his right to receive proper remuneration for commission should be honourably met. A fortnight later the directors issued a prospectus, in which it was stated, on the advice of counsel, that the only contracts to which the company was a party were the promotion agreement of May and the purchase agreement of the 26th of September.

Held, that the contract of the 21st of September was not wholly cancelled by the arrangement of the 10th of October, and that in any event both contracts should have been disclosed in the prospectus under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Held, also, that the fact that the contracts were omitted on the advice of counsel was no defence.

15. Prospectus—Director—Promoter—Shareholder —Contract by directors and promoters—Omission from prospectus—"Fraudulent" prospectus—Waiver clause —Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38. —The directors and promoters of a company in process of formation agreed with a firm that, in consideration of the latter's underwriting 10,000 shares in the company, the firm was to receive 12,000 vendor shares as a commission therefor, but 10,000 shares were in fact for the use of the firm's name on the prospectus on their approving of the soundness of the undertaking; and, further, that the firm was to be appointed commercial agents for the company, whose registered office was to be situate at its address, while a member of the firm was to go on the prospectus as chairman of the company. The prospectus of the company did not disclose this agreement, but contained a waiver clause, that there might be various trade contracts and business arrangements of which intending subscribers were to be deemed to have notice.

Held, that the contract was one which it was material to an intending investor to know, that the waiver clause did not give such intending investor fair and sufficient notice of the omission, and that by reason of its omission from the prospectus the prospectus must be deemed fraudulent within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, though such omission was not in fact made with any fraudulent intent.

Decision of Farwell, J. (50 W. R. 16), affirmed.—CACKETT v. KESWICK, C.A., 69; [1902] 2 Ch. 456; 71 L. J. Ch. 641; 87 L. T. 11.

16. Prospectus—Misrepresentations in prospectus—Contribution from co director—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 54), s. 5.—By section 5 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, "every person who by reason of his being a director, or named as a director, or as having agreed to become a director, or of his having authorized the issue of the prospectus or notice, has become liable to make any payment under the provisions of this Act, shall be entitled to recover contribution, as in cases of contract, from any other person who, if sued separately, would have been liable to make the same payment."

Held, that this section gives a right of contribution in respect of a claim to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentations in a prospectus of a company inviting persons to subscribe for shares, as well as in respect of a claim to recover damages for an untrue statement in the prospectus apart from fraud.—GERSON v. SIMPSON, C.A., 610; [1903] 2 K. 18. Prospectus—Omission of material contracts—"Knowingly issue"—Waiver clause—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.—The defendant, who was a director of a company, took part in issuing a prospectus inviting persons to subscribe for shares in the company. The prospectus did not disclose certain material contracts which had been entered into, as required by section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. It, however, contained a clause stating that contracts relating to the formation and promotion of the company had been entered into, and that these "are or may be" contracts within the 38th section of the Act, and that applicants for shares were to be deemed to have waived all claims against directors and others for the section not being more fully complied with. The defendant had actual knowledge of the existence of the undisclosed contracts, but not of their nature and effect, and was content to leave the statements of the prospectus to others without inquiry. The plaintiff took shares upon the faith of the prospectus, but upon hearing of the undisclosed contracts brought an action against the defendant for compensation.

Held, that the defendant had "knowingly issued" the prospectus, and that, under the circumstances, his ignorance of the nature and effect of the undisclosed contracts was no answer to the action.

Held, also, that the waiver clause did not fairly disclose to an intending investor what it was that he should waive, and therefore did not protect the defendant from liability for non-disclosure of the contracts.

19. Reduction of capital—Cancellation of shares—No loss of capital—No return of capital—Equilibrium of balance-sheet—Prejudice of creditors—Fresh shares accepted and paid for of larger nominal value than shares proposed to be cancelled—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict c. 131), ss. 9, 11—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.—A limited company cannot reduce its capital by cancelling any of its fully paid-up shares merely because the holders consent to give them up, because to do so would affect the equilibrium of the balance-sheet to the prejudice of the creditors, by diminishing the amount of the assets which can only be used for capital purposes.

But when, as part of the arrangement for the reduction of capital, the holders of the shares given up take from the company further shares of greater nominal value, so that the nominal capital of the company is not diminished, the court may confirm the reduction.

Section 3 of the Companies Act, 1877, by specifically giving power to cancel lost capital or to return paid-up capital, impliedly forbids the writing off of capital which is neither lost nor returned.—ANGLO-FRENCH EXPLORATION CO., RE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 8; [1902] 2 Ch. 845; 71 L. J. Ch. 800.

22. Reduction of capital — Power to reduce in memorandum, but not in articles of association—Regulations—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 9.—The memorandum of association of a company gave the company power to reduce its capital, but the articles of association of the company contained no such power.

The company passed special resolutions purporting to reduce its capital, and petitioned the court for confirmation of the reduction.

Held, that the word "regulations" in section 9 of the Companies Act, 1867, meant the articles and not the memorandum of association, and that it was necessary to alter the articles by inserting a power to reduce capital before passing a special resolution for reduction.—DEXINE PATENT PACKING CO., RE, *Ch.D. 25. Sale to intermediary company—Resale to new company—Commission — Underwriting agreement—Offer to public—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 8 (1) (2).—A company sold its undertaking on the terms that the purchasers should form a new company to repurchase the property. The consideration for sale to the purchasers was to be shares in the new company, and the consideration for the resale to the new company was to be the same number of shares together with a sum in cash. The purchasers were to take up all shares that were not taken up by members of the old company.

Held, that the proposed cash payment was a payment by way of "commission, discount, or allowance . . . in consideration of . . . subscribing . . . for . . . shares" of the new company within sub-section 2 of section 8 of the Companies Act, 1900, and that as such payment was not authorized by the articles of the new company it was not validated by sub-section 1 of the same section.—BOOTH v. NEW AFRIKANDER GOLD MINING CO., C.A., 193; [1903] 1 Ch. 295; 72 L. Section 8, sub-section 2, of the Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), does not render such an agreement unlawful.

Held, that the purchasers were liable to pay the amount unpaid on the shares, and that they were not discharged by there having been a previous call which remained unpaid.

28. Shares—Forfeiture of shares — Rescission of forfeiture— Articles of association. — The articles of association of a company provided that on non-payment of a call on shares the directors might forfeit the shares; that the forfeited shares should be the property of the company; that before the shares were disposed of the directors might "annul the forfeiture" upon such conditions as they thought fit; and that notwithstanding the forfeiture the shareholders should be liable to pay all calls, interest, and expenses owing in respect of the shares at the time of forfeiture.

The directors passed a resolution forfeiting the the shares of L. for non-payment of a call, and gave him notice of the forfeiture. On demand L. paid the call, interest, and expenses, and at the same time wrote that he repudiated any further liability on the shares.

Nine months afterwards the directors passed a resolution purporting to rescind the forfeiture and giving notice to L. that he was registered in respect of the shares. L. replied declining to have his name reinstated as owner of the shares.

Held, that the company had no power adversely to L. to reinstate him with the liability of a shareholder.—EXCHANGE TRUST, RE, LARKWORTHY'S CASE, Ch.D. Buckley, J.; [1903] 1 Ch. 711; 72 L. J. Ch. 387; 88 L. T. 56.

The stamp on the transfer was in accordance with the consideration stated on the face of it, but it was discovered that the consideration so stated was less than that which had been given. The directors thereupon refused to register the transfer. In an action to recover damages arising out of this refusal:

Held, that since a transfer not duly stamped according to law would not, by reason of section 14, sub-section 4, of the Stamp Act, 1891, be available in a court of law either to enforce rights of the company against the transferee, or to justify an alteration of the register of shareholders, the directors were entitled to refuse to register the transfer, and that in determining whether the transfer was duly stamped they were entitled to go behind that which appeared on the face of the document.—MAYNARD v. CONSOLIDATED KENT

32. Winding up—Contributory—Shares allotted without consideration—Liability of allottee—Misfeasance of directors.—In 1899 two brothers, Messrs. R. I. and J. I., who had certain patent rights, arranged with six shipowners to form a private company, and to sell to such company their business and patent rights for £6,000, payable as to £3,000 in cash and as to £3,000 in fully-paid shares. It was arranged (1) that the capital of the company should be £25,000, divided into 2,500 shares of £10 each; (2) that the vendors should take 300 fully paid-up shares as the balance of their purchase-money; (3) that the six shipowners should take and pay for fifty shares apiece for the purpose of raising the £3,000 payable in cash to the vendors; (4) that of the remaining 1,900 shares each of the six shipowners should take 300 fully-paid shares for his own benefit; (5) that the last 100 shares should be held in reserve and should be applied in making bonus payments to persons introducing business to the company. On the 7th of December, 1899, the company was duly incorporated with the capital above stated. No prospectus was issued, and there was no intention to go to the public with shares.

In pursuance of the above-mentioned arrangement an agreement, dated the 23rd of March, 1900, was entered into between the vendors and the company, whereby the vendors purported to sell their business and patent rights to the company for £25,000, payable as to £3,000 in cash and as to £22,000 by the allotment to the vendors or their nominees of 2,200 fully-paid shares. This agreement was duly registered, and the shares were allotted in accordance with the antecedent arrangement.

In November, 1901, the company went into liquidation, and a summons was taken out by the liquidator against the four directors—viz., R. I. and three of the shipowners, for a declaration that the three shipowner directors were liable as contributories for the full amount of the fully paid-up shares which they had received, and, in the alternative, for a declaration that all four directors were liable for misfeasance.

Held, that the contract of the 23rd of March, 1900, carried out the true previous intention of the parties; that it was a genuine contract of sale as between the vendors and the company; that the director allottees received these shares as nominees under the rights of the vendors; and consequently that the liquidator could not make them liable as contributories.

Held, further, that the directors were not liable on the ground of misfeasance, all the shareholders having known of and acquiesced in the transaction.

If creditors or shareholders, after receiving such a letter, appear on, and successfully oppose, the appeal, they will only be entitled to one set of costs among them, the rule in the court below applying in such a case in the Court of Appeal.—IBO INVESTMENT TRUST, RE, C.A., 593; 72 L. CONFLICT OF LAWS—

1. Intestate—Domicil of origin—Domicil of choice—Distribution—A testatrix, born in Malta died in Baden, leaving part of her personal property undisposed of by her will. She was domiciled in Baden at the date of her will and up to her death, but was not naturalized there. According to the law of Baden the legal succession to the property which the testatrix had not disposed of by will was governed solely by the law of the country of which she was a subject at the time of her death.

Held, that the undisposed-of personal estate was to be distributed among the persons who would be entitled thereto according to Maltese law.—JOHNSON, RE., ROBERTS v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 444; [1903] 1 Ch. 821; 88 L. T. 161.

2. Lex loci contractus—Contract made according to the laws of the country of the contract, and intended to be performed there—Invalid in England—Right to enforce such contract in England—K., the plaintiff, handed to one Emile Gerson, the husband of the defendant, in France a sum of money to be used in buying skins to be dressed and sold for their joint benefit. Gerson appropriated part of the money to his own use, instead of applying it to buy skins. His conduct was criminal in France, and plaintiff threatened a prosecution. In order to avoid a prosecution the defendant, by an agreement in writing made in France, agreed to pay to the plaintiff by instalments out of her own money the amount of the defalcation on the express terms of the plaintiff abstaining from prosecuting. This agreement was intended to be governed by the French law and to be wholly performed in France. By the French law this agreement was not invalid. The defendant being temporarily resident in England, and having property here, action was brought against her here to recover instalments due and payable under the agreement.

Held, that the contract, being valid by the law of the country in which it was made and intended to be performed, though invalid in England as being contrary to public policy, was enforceable here.—KAUFMAN v. GERSON, K B.D., 683; [1903] 2 K. B. 114; 72 L. J. K. B. 596; 88 L. T. 691.

3. Power of appointment—Execution—Domiciled foreigner—Will valid by law of domicil but invalid by English law—General bequest—Construction—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.—Although a will executing a power takes effect as operating on the instrument containing the power, and must be read as if it was interpolated into that instrument, yet being a will, it must, in the absence of a contrary intention, be construed according to the law of the domicil of the testator. In such construction, if the domicil of a testator be foreign, section 27 of the Wills Act, which is a rule for the construction only of wills of which an English court is the court of construction, has no place, in the absence of any express direction that the will is to be construed according to English law.

A French subject domiciled in France, having a power of appointment over a fund under an English instrument, left all her property to her husband by a will which was valid according to French, but invalid according to English law. The will contained no express reference to the power, and no express direction that it was to be construed according to English law. Administration with the will annexed was granted in England.

Held, that the power had not been exercised.

4. Scotch law—Scotch marriage contract made in Scotland—Lex loci—Life interest by way of alimentary provision—Inalienable life interest in domiciled Englishman—Fraud upon creditors—Public policy.—By a Scotch marriage contract a domiciled Scotchwoman settled property (including what by the law of Scotland is for certain purposes deemed to be Scotch real estate) upon trust (among other purposes) to pay the income to F., her intended husband, a domiciled Englishman, for his life, and the contract contained a declaration "that all payments to the said F. should be strictly alimentary, and should not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors." The trustees of the settlement were English, and the trusts had been administered in England. F. had purported to charge his life estate.

Held, that even if the construction and effect of the contract was to be determined by Scotch law, yet its validity and operation must be governed by the law of England, and that an inalienable life estate to a man being contrary and repugnant to the public policy of English law, F. was not entitled to payment of the income as against his incumbrancers.—FITZGERALD, RE, SURMAN v. FITZGERALD, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 586; [1903] 1 Ch. 933; 72 L. J. Ch 430; 88 L. T. 326.

CONTRACT:—

1. Agreement to participate in profits of business for a specific period—Sale of business within such period—Implied stipulation not to sell—Breach.—The plaintiffs brought an action for the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendants admitted the claim, but counterclaimed for damages in respect of an alleged breach of contract by the plaintiffs under the following circumstance. In March, 1902, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with the defendants whereby they agreed to participate with the defendants, for the period of four years from that date, in the profits of the plaintiff company's business on the goods sold for them by the defendants. In the course of the same year the plaintiffs sold their goodwill and business to another company. The defendants alleged that the plaintiffs had thereby committed a breach of contract, and they claimed damages in respect of such breach, on the ground that, owing to such sale, they, the defendants, were thereby prevented from participating in the profits promised by the plaintiffs for the remainder of the four years.

Held, that the plaintiffs had by the sale of their business committed a breach of contract, as there was an implied stipulation that they would continue to carry on their business for four years.

2. Assignability—Obligation performable by deputy—Action by assignor and assignee.—By a contract between T., the owner of a chalk quarry, and a cement manufacturing company, who were the owners and occupiers of neighbouring land, it was agreed that T. would supply and the company would take and buy at a specified price 750 tons of chalk a week, and so much more as the company should require for the manufacture of cement on their said land. The contract was to last for fifty years. Subsequently the company went into liquidation for the purpose of being amalgamated with a new company with a very much larger capital, and all the property and business of the old company, and the benefit of its trade contracts, were assigned to the new company. The deed of assignment contained a covenant by the new company to indemnify the old company against all liabilities on trade contracts. In an action by the old company and the new company against T.,

Held, that, as there was nothing personal to the old company in receiving or paying for chalk, or in the requirements for the manufacture of cement on the said land, the contract remained enforceable against T., and he was bound to supply chalk to the new company at the price specified in the contract.

3. Author and publisher—Agreement to edit—"Cheaper or other form of edition"—Parol agreement—Damages for breach.—An author and publisher entered into an agreement in 1894 under which the author was to edit the whole of the plays of Shakespeare (to be called the Temple Shakespeare), and was to write an introduction, notes, and glossary for each play. The publisher was to pay the author a royalty, and the copyright was vested in the publisher. Clause 10 provided: "In the event of a cheaper or other form of edition of any or either of the plays being thought advisable by the publisher, it shall form the subject of an agreement with the author on similar pro rata terms to those embodied herein." The publication was very successful, and in 1899 a large Temple Shakespeare was produced, the notes and glossary being identical with those in smaller editions, but illustrations were added; a royalty was paid to the author upon this edition. Discussion took place as to the production of a Shakespeare for schools, and the author stated that in March, 1901, a definite agreement was made as to the royalty to be paid him in respect of this edition, and denied that he ever failed or neglected or threatened to abandon its production. The publisher produced a Temple Shakespeare for schools with notes, introduction, and glossary written by a person other than the author. The author applied for an injunction restraining the issue of this edition, or, in the alternative, for damages for breach of the agreement.

Held, that there had been an agreement that the author should be paid a royalty on the school Shakespeare, and that he had always been ready to perform the work, and that the publisher had committed a breach of the agreement of 1894, supplemented by the verbal agreement of 1901; that it was not a case for an injunction, but that there must be a reference to chambers to assess the damages.—GOLLANCZ v. DENT, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 88 L. T. 358.

4. Bailee of goods—Owner's risk clause—Act intentionally done—No knowledge that damage would result—Liability.—Cheese was received by the defendants "to be stored at owner's risk," and the defendants were not to be responsible for damage or loss caused by certain specified matters or "from any other cause whatever." The cheese was kept at too low a temperature, and the jury found there was want of skill.

Held, that there was nothing to do away with the owner's risk clause, for although the act was intentionally done that did not amount to wilful misconduct, and so the defendants were not liable.—CORDEY v. CARDIFF PURE ICE CO., C.A.; 88 L. T. 192.

5. Breach — Several provisions — Liquidated damages—Penalty.—By an agreement W. agreed to purchase a public-house of B. and the fittings, and to take the stock to a certain amount and pay for the same; B. agreed to assign the licences and pay certain rates and taxes and give possession, and not carry on the business of a licensed victualler within one mile, W. further agreeing to pay the purchase-money and produce references.

It was further provided "that if either of the said parties should neglect to perform or refuse to comply with any part of this agreement" the party refusing or neglecting should pay the other £25 as liquidated damages.

Held, that this was a penalty.—BRADLEY v. WALSH, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 737.

6. Construction of works—Plant and materials on ground—Mortgage by contractor—Default in completion of works—Rights of building owner.—The clause in an ordinary contract for the construction of works upon lands, that the plant and materials brought upon the land to be used for the purposes of construction shall be considered to be the property of the owner of the land, must, in the absence of any stipulation in the contract incompatible with such construction, be construed as immediately vesting in such owner all plant and materials so brought upon the land, subject to a right of the contractor, upon his completion of the works, to have the plant returned to him.—HART v. PORTHGAIN HARBOUR CO., Farwell, J., 461; [1903] 1 Ch. 690; 72 L. J. Ch. 426; 88 L. T. 341.

7. Damages—Negligence—Plans negligently drawn by architect.—The plaintiffs, lessees of a piece of land, intending to erect a factory thereon, employed the defendant, an architect, to prepare plans. The architect, acting on unauthorized and incorrect information as to the dimensions of the building site, drew up plans and neglected to measure the site himself. The plaintiffs paid for the plans, believing them to be correct, but owing to financial difficulties were unable to proceed with the building operations, and eventually sold their interest in the site, when it was discovered that the plans were incorrect. The plaintiffs thereupon sued the defendant, claiming the return of the money paid as having been paid upon a consideration which had wholly failed, or, in the alternative, damages for negligence.

Held, that the consideration had not wholly failed, but that the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages in respect of the defendant's negligence.—COLUMBUS CO. v. CLOWES, K.B.D., 366; [1903] 1 K. B. 244; 72 L. J. K. B. 330.

8. Implied condition—Contract to take room to view procession—Purpose incorporated into contract—Postponement of procession—Impossibility of performance at time of making contract—Amended contract for postponed procession—Right to recover back money paid for room.—On the 24th of June, 1902, the plaintiff agreed to take and the defendant agreed to let to the plaintiff a room for the purpose of viewing the Coronation procession on the 27th of June, upon the condition (amongst others) that the room should be used by the plaintiff only for the purpose of viewing the procession on that day, and the plaintiff agreed to take the room on those conditions for the purpose and period specified, and he then paid his money for the letting of the room. There was no provision in the contract for the return of the money if the procession did not take place. Immediately afterwards the plaintiff saw an announcement in a newspaper that the procession had been postponed, and he then went back to the defendant and showed him the announcement. The defendant replied that the postponement was only for a day or two, and the defendant then at the plaintiff's request wrote and signed under the conditions a note that if the procession should be postponed the plaintiff was to have the use of the room on the same conditions as arranged for the 27th of June. At the time the contract was made the condition of the King had been ascertained to be such as to make the procession impossible, and the procession was ultimately abandoned. In an action by the plaintiff to recover back the money paid by him for the room,

Held, as to the contract in its original form, that as the purpose for which the contract was made—namely, the viewing of the procession—was incorporated into and became part of the contract and the substance of it, the contract must be taken as subject to the implied condition that if the intention to hold the procession were abandoned neither party should be bound by the contract, and consequently, as the purpose was, at the time the contract was made, impossible of performance, the contract was inoperative, and the plaintiff upon that ground would have been entitled to recover back the money paid by him if no subsequent arrangement had been made.

But held, further, that the effect of the subsequent arrangement was to make a new contract between the parties in respect of a postponed procession into which no such implied condition could be imported, and as this postponed procession was not impossible at the time the arrangement was made, the money must remain in the hands of the receiver, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover it back.—CLARK v. LINDSAY, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 198.

9. Impossibility of performance—Charter of ship for review and cruise—Review abandoned.—A ship was chartered for the 28th of June "for the purposes of viewing the Naval Review and for a day's cruise round the fleet; also on Sunday, the 29th of June, for a similar purpose. . . . Price £250, payable £50 down, balance before ship leaves H. B." On the Naval Review being abandoned the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendant: "What about C.? She is ready to start six to-morrow. Waiting cash." Receiving no reply, they continued C. in her ordinary sailings.

Held, in an action to recover £200, the balance under the agreement, that the plaintiffs could not recover.—HERNE BAY STEAMBOAT CO. v. HUTTON, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 269.

10. Impossibility of performance—Money paid before that event—Right to recover back—Money paid for seats to view Coronation procession.—Tickets having been purchased for seats to view the Coronation procession on the 27th of June, the money was paid over to the vendors. The Coronation procession did not take place on the 27th of June, owing to the illness of the King, and was abandoned. In actions by the purchasers to recover back the money so paid to the vendors,

Held, that the money could not be recovered back. Where money has been paid under a contract the further performance of which has become impossible owing to the non-existence of the subject-matter of the contract, the contract is not rescinded ab initio, but both parties are excused from any further performance under the contract.

Per Channell, J.—If the money had been payable by the contract on some day subsequent to the abandonment of the procession, it could not have been recovered. If the money was payable prior to the abandonment it would be the same as if it had been actually paid and could be recovered by action.—BLAKELEY v. MULLER, HOBSON v. PATTENDEN, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 90.

11. Personal services—Jockey—Injury—Temporary incapacity—"Failure to procure licence."—On the 28th of October, 1899, by an agreement the defendant was to have the first claim on the services of the plaintiff as a jockey for the flat-racing seasons 1900, 1901, and 1902, and in case the plaintiff should die "or shall fail to procure a licence during the said term this agreement shall be at an end." On the 14th of November, 1901, the plaintiff was severely injured in an accident while riding. On the 17th of March the flat-racing season commenced for 1902. The plaintiff having in due course applied for his licence, the stewards suggested that he should apply when he was sufficiently recovered so as to be able to ride. On the 14th of April, 1902, he applied again, and received his licence a few days before he was fit to ride, and rode his first race on the 14th of May.

Held, that the incapacity from the effects of the accident to ride for the period from the 13th of March to the 14th of May did not involve such a failure of consideration and such destruction of the substance of the agreement as to bring the agreement to an end.

Held, further, that the plaintiff had not "failed to procure a licence."—LOATES v. MAPLE, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 288.

12. Setting aside on ground of common mistake—Date to which common mistake should be referred—No delay in seeking the aid of the court.—Although the court is in some cases averse to setting aside a contract after completion upon the ground of common mistake, even where there is a suggestion of fraud, yet the court will set aside such a contract after completion if the plaintiff seeks the aid of the court with promptitude, and if the parties can without difficulty be restored to the position in which they were before the contract.—SCOTT v. COULSON, Kekewich, J., 394; affirmed [1903] 2 Ch. 249; 72 L. 13. Statute of Frauds—Letters—Offer "subject to agreement stating fully the conditions being prepared and signed"—Specific performance.—W.'s solicitor wrote on his behalf to M. as follows: "Re Mason's

Arms, Dinnington.—We agree to sell the above for £1,775 subject to agreement stating fully the conditions being prepared and signed at our office on Monday, say, at eleven o'clock." The agent of M. replied: "I beg to accept yours of this date re Mason's Arms on behalf of Mr. M"

Held, that these two letters did not constitute a contract between the parties. — WATSON v. MCALLUM, Joyce, J.; 87 L. T. 547.

Administrator of convict's property—Power of sale—Action by convict against administrator—Felony Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), ss. 12, 17, 20.—The power of sale over the property of a convict conferred, by section 12 of the Felony Act, 1870, on his administrator, is absolute, and is not limited to a power of sale for the purpose of making the payments authorized by the Act. If in regard to any sale of such property the administrator has in fact exercised a discretion, and his conduct has been otherwise bonâ fide, there has been a bonâ fide sale by him within section 17, and the sale cannot be called in question by the convict.

COPYRIGHT:—

1. Literary copyright—Encyclopædia—Contributor and publisher—Employment and payment—Ownership of copyright—Separate publication—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 3, 18.—In a case where an author agrees with publishers to write for payment articles for an encyclopædia to be published by them, and there is no express agreement as to the ownership of the copyright in the articles, it is not to be inferred as a matter of law from the fact of employment and payment that the employment was on the terms that the copyright should belong to the publishers. And such articles are "separately published" within the meaning of the definition of "book" in section 2 of the Copyright Act, 1842.

So held by Romer and Stirling, L.JJ. (dissentiente Vaughan Williams, L.J.).

Held, by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the true inference was that the copyright in the articles was to belong to the publisher, and that they were not "separately published."

Therefore where a court of summary jurisdiction is satisfied that pirated copies of a musical work are being sold at a private house it has jurisdiction to make an order in the terms of the section, authorizing a constable to seize such copies without a warrant.

Subsequently the original demand for a poll was withdrawn by its proposer, and the mayor refused to treat the action of the seconder as a demand of a poll by him. Upon an application by the second ratepayer for a mandamus to the mayor,

Held, that the action of the applicant was in substance a demand of a poll by him within the meaning of rule 6 of the schedule.

The plaintiff performed the services which he was from time to time required to perform, and the council had the benefit of his services. The contract was not under seal.

Held (reversing the decision of Darling, J.), that the plaintiff was entitled to recover remuneration for the services which he had rendered, although there was no contract under seal, because his services had been accepted by the council, and the whole consideration for payment was therefore executed.

The corporation, acting without negligence, accepted and registered the transfer, and in due course issued certificates to the transferee, one of the defendants, as holder and owner of the stock, thereby incurring liability to the real owner whose name had been forged, and in an action subsequently brought against him by the latter, they were ordered to make good the loss sustained by him.

Held, that as between the corporation and the transferee, both innocent parties, the loss incurred by the former in acting on the forged transfer must be borne by the transferee who, although he had acted in good faith and without negligence, had sent the forged transfer to the corporation requesting them to act upon the same.

2. Costs—Money paid into court—Plaintiff recovering no more than amount paid in—Costs of particular issues—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 113.—Where money has been paid into court, and the plaintiff recovers no more than the amount paid in, the defendant is entitled to the general costs of the action, but the county court judge has the same power as a judge of the High Court to give the plaintiff the costs of any issue on which he has succeeded. — DUNN v. SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO., K.B.D., 427; [1903] 1 K. 3. Execution—Seizure of goods not the property of judgment debtor—No claim made by owner—Sale—Title of purchaser—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 154.—Where goods are taken in execution by the bailiff of a county court, and, no claim having been made to them, are sold by the bailiff, and it subsequently appears that they were not the property of the judgment debtor at the time of the seizure or sale, the purchaser does not acquire a good title to the goods as against the real owner.

5. Practice—Joint judgment—Order for committal against one defendant—Power to issue further summons—County Court Rules, 1889, r. 25.—The power of the county court judge to issue a committal order is a new jurisdiction in which he has to consider all the facts of the case, and is not analagous to the old writ of fi. fa. It is therefore within his jurisdiction to give leave to issue a judgment summons against a debtor, even though one has been already issued against a co-defendant to which no return has been made.—REX. v. BIRMINGHAM COUNTY COURT JUDGE, K.B.D., 75; [1902] 2 K. COVENANT:—

Restrictive covenant—Covenant running with the land—No land retained by covenantee—Breach after death of covenantee—Right of executor to sue.—Where a negative or restrictive covenant is imposed upon the user of land it will not be enforced against an owner not a party to the deed containing the covenant, if such covenant is merely personal and collateral to a conveyance of land.

In 1868 F. sold to X., a land company, all his land situate at a certain place. X. covenanted for themselves, their successors and assigns, with F., his heirs, executors, and administrators, that they would not build a beershop on a certain portion of the land sold. F. died in 1884, and X. conveyed the portion of land to which the restrictive covenant applied, with notice of that covenant, to B. In 1902 B. commenced to build in defiance of the covenant.

Held, in an action brought by the sole devisee and administratrix, with the will annexed of F., to restrain B. from building, that no such action could be maintained.

CRIMINAL LAW:—

1. Conspiracy—Joint indictment of three persons—Plea of "Guilty" by one—Verdict of "Not Guilty" in respect of the others—Withdrawal of plea before sentence—Jurisdiction to allow withdrawal—Crown Cases Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 78), s. 1.—The appellant and two other persons were jointly charged on an indictment which contained five counts for obtaining money by false pretences, and a sixth count for conspiring to defraud the Thames Conservators. The sixth count did not allege that there were any other or unknown parties to the conspiracy. All three defendants were indicted in one arraignment. All pleaded "Not Guilty" to the first five counts. The appellant pleaded "Guilty" to the sixth count; the other defendants plead "Not Guilty" to the sixth count as well as to the first five counts. The jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty" in favour of the appellant on the first five counts, and the trial of the other defendants proceeded, and the appellant was called as a witness on behalf of the prosecution. The jury found the two defendants "Not Guilty" on all the six counts. The appellant thereupon requested to be allowed to withdraw his plea of "Guilty" on the sixth count. The court of quarter sessions held they had no jurisdiction to allow him the withdrawal, and convicted him.

Held, on appeal, that the judgment passed against the appellant was bad, and could not stand.

Held, further, that the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to allow the appellant to withdraw the plea of "Guilty" and plead "Not Guilty" before passing sentence upon him.

Held, further, that a question arising on a plea of "Guilty" is a question arising "on the trial," within the meaning of section 1 of the Crown Cases Act, 1848, and that, therefore, the Court for Crown Cases had power under section 2 of that Act to entertain a case reserving that question, and in the exercise of such power to make such order as justice may require.

2. Conspiracy—Trades union—Intimidation—Conviction insufficiently describing offence—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 39, sub-section 1.—Notwithstanding section 39, sub-section 1, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, it is still obligatory to state on the face of a conviction the facts which are necessary ingredients of the offence.

By section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, a person "who with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing . . . any act which such other person has a legal right to do . . . wrongfully and without legal authority . . . injures his property," commits an offence.

The appellant was convicted under this section, the conviction stating that on the 4th of February, 1902, he, "with a view to compel" the respondent "to abstain from working for Messrs. John Bowes & Partners (Limited), at Felling Colliery, which he had a legal right to do, wrongfully and without legal authority did injure the property" of the respondent.

Held, that the conviction was not bad for not sufficiently stating the precise work which the respondent was compelled to abstain from doing; but that it was bad for not specifically stating what was the property injured.

4. Sale of intoxicating liquor to child under fourteen—Delivery in vessel improperly corked and sealed—Intoxicating Liquor (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), ss. 2, 5.—Where the holder of a licence to sell intoxicating liquor sells or delivers, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any such liquor to a child under the age of fourteen years for consumption by any person on or off the premises in a vessel not corked and sealed as required by the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, he is guity of an offence under section 2 of that Act, notwithstanding that at the time he sold and delivered such liquor he honestly believed that the vessel was properly corked and sealed in accordance with the requirements of the Act.—BROOKS v. MASON, K.B.D., 224; [1902] 2 K. 5. Sale of intoxicating liquor to children—Vessel not properly sealed—Evidence—Gummed paper label—Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), s. 2.—The appellant was charged under section 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, with selling beer to a child under fourteen, the beer not being sold in a sealed vessel. It was proved that a gummed paper label was affixed over the screw stopper of the bottle, extending about an inch down two sides of the neck of the bottle. The label was dry at the time of sale, but by moistening the label with the tongue and so damping the gum the label could be removed without its being torn. The justices found that the bottle was not sealed as required by the Act, and convicted the appellant.

Held, that there was evidence to support the finding of the justices.—MITCHELL v. CRAWSHAW, K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. B. 701; 72 L. J. K. B. 389; 88 L. T. 463.

6. Summary jurisdiction — Prosecution—Unlawfully killing house pigeon—Right of any person other than owner to prosecute—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 23.—The right to prosecute under section 23 of the Larceny Act, 1861, for unlawfully and willfully killing a house pigeon under such circumstances as do not amount to larceny at common law, is not limited to the owner of the pigeon or the person aggrieved, and it is competent to any person to prosecute for an offence committed under that section, even though compensation has been paid to the owner and the owner is satisfied with such compensation.—SMITH v. DEAR, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 664.

7. Treason—Procedure—Defect in indictment—Power to quash—Nationality—Change in time of war—Adhering to the King's enemies in the realm or elsewhere—Statute of Treasons (25 Ed. 3, c. 7)—Naturalization Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 14), ss. 6 and 15.—The prisoner, a British subject, went to the Transvaal and there signed a declaration declaring his willingness to take up arms against Great Britain, and also took the oath of allegiance to the Transvaal Republic. He was then naturalized there, and fought against the British forces. He was indicted for treason under 25 Ed. 3, Statute 5, c. 2, on a charge (inter alia) adhering to the King's enemies in the realm or elsewhere.

Held, that naturalization in time of war is an illegal act, and confers no rights on anyone, and that the prisoner was not protected by the 6th section of the Naturalization Act, 1870.

Held, further, that it was not necessary that the prisoner should be within the realm in order to support an indictment under the Act of Edward III.

Held, also, that in cases of treason it is not usual to quash the indictment, but the prisoner can proceed by way of motion in arrest of judgment.—REX v. LYNCH, K.B.D., 619; [1903] 1 K. B. 444; 72 L. J. K. B. 167; 88 L. T. 26.

DISTRESS—

Distress—Sale—Property in goods distrained—2 W. & M., Sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2.—A landlord distrained upon premises for rent due, and seized amongst other articles, a sewing machine which had been hired by the tenant. The goods were sold by auction, and at the sale the machine was bought in by the landlord's agent. The owners of the machine then seized it. In an action for conversion, Held, that a sale to be valid must be a sale to third parties, and that the buying in by the landlord did not change the property in the sewing machine.

DIVORCE:—

1. Condonation—Adultery—Desertion—Revival—Decree of dissolution of marriage.—Desertion for two years without reasonable excuse revives condoned adultery.

Where a husband was guilty of incestuous adultery, which was condoned by the wife, and he was afterwards guilty of desertion:—

Held, that the desertion revived the condoned adultery, and that the wife was entitled to a decree dissolving her marriage.—HOUGHTON v. HOUGHTON, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 150; 72 L. J. P. 31.

2. Maintenance—Husband's petition—Permanent alimony for wife—State of wife's health and other circumstances—Discretion of court—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32—The court has an absolute discretion under section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, as to ordering the husband to grant permanent alimony to his wife on a decree for dissolution of the marriage, and may suspend the making absolute of the decree until the husband makes provision for her if the wife is in ill-health and cannot support herself, even though she be the guilty party and his own conduct be irreproachable, and though he has derived no pecuniary benefit from the marriage and has obtained no damages from the co-respondent.

3. Maintenance—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32.—The court has no power under section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, to order a lump sum to be paid to the petitioner for maintenance.—TWENTYMAN v. TWENTYMAN, P.D. & Ad.D., 575; [1903] P. 82; 72 L. J. P. 36; 88 L. T. 571.

4. Nullity of marriage—Decree—Variation of settlements.—After a decree absolute had been obtained in a suit for nullity of marriage on the ground of the incapacity of the husband, the court was of opinion that all points affecting the antenuptial settlement of the parties should be dealt with finally and at once, even though it was not decided whether such a settlement came to an end by reason of a decree absolute. It was ordered that the interest of the husband (respondent) in the fund settled by the wife should be extinguished, and that the fund settled by the husband should be retransferred to him after payment of the costs of the petitioner and the trustees of the settlement.—ATTWOOD v. ATTWOOD, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 7; 71 L. J. P. 129; 87 L. T. 750.

5. Order—Mistake—Power of court to rectify—Nullity of marriage.—Where a mistake has been made in drawing up an order the court or a judge has power to alter it, even where it is under appeal and though the request for alteration be made by the party who has given notice of appeal against the order as drawn up.—E. v. E., P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 88; 72 L. J. P. 44; 88 L. T. 570.

6. Practice—Act on petition—Mode of trial—Jury—Discretion of court.—Notwithstanding rule 61 of the Divorce Court Rules, 1865, the court has a discretion whether an act on petition shall or not be tried with a jury.—LÖWENFELD v. LÖWENFELD, C.A.; [1903] P. 177.

7. Practice—Consolidated suits for judicial separation and dissolution—Power to hear in camerâ.—The court possesses inherent jurisdiction to order any case to be heard in camerâ.

In a suit for judicial separation by a wife, the particulars in which disclosed allegations of filthy practices, but in which no suggestion was made of sodomy or bestiality, the court, notwithstanding the fact that with the wife's suit had been consolidated a suit by the husband for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent, ordered, with the consent of all the parties, that the case should be heard in camerâ by a judge sitting with a special jury.—D. v. D., P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 144; 72 L. J. P. 51; 88 L. T. 573.

8. Practice—Husband's petition—Wife's adultery—Passive acquiescence on husband's part—Conduct conducing to adultery—Refusal of decree.—Where, in a petition for divorce by the husband on the ground of his wife's adultery, it appeared that he had taken no steps beyond mere verbal remonstrances to terminate a course of conduct on the part of his wife and the co-respondent, which, if it did not bring about actual adultery at the time, eventually resulted in it, Held, that the petitioner was not entitled to relief, and that the petition should be dismissed.—ROBINSON v. ROBINSON, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 155.

9. Practice—Intervener's costs.—Where the respondent did not deny at the trial his adultery with a woman, who, on learning that he was not going to deny the charge, obtained leave to intervene, and the petition as against her was dismissed,

The court held that the intervener ought to be placed in the best possible position to obtain the costs of her intervention, and that the costs of it ought to fall upon the respondent as well as the petitioner.—WADE v. WADE, P.D. & Ad.D., 464; [1903] P. 16; 72 L. J. P. 1; 87 L. T. 751.

10. Practice—Pleading—Custody of children—Paternity.—If a wife, respondent in a suit for dissolution of marriage, wishes to raise any question as to the paternity of any child or children whose custody is claimed by the husband (petitioner), she must file an answer in the suit specifically raising the question as to the paternity of such child or children; and, unless she so plead, she will not be allowed at the hearing to raise any question as to the paternity, in opposition to her husband's application for custody of such child or children.—GORDON v. GORDON & BELL, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 92; 72 L. EASEMENT:—

1. Ancient lights—Consent or agreement—Window—Skylight—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3.—In 1873 the predecessor in title of the plaintiff erected a conservatory abutting on the defendant's property, and entered into an agreement with the defendant's predecessor in title whereby he agreed to pay one shilling a year to defendant's predecessor for allowing the window of his conservatory to overlook and open on to the defendant's property. The sloping top of the conservatory was of glazed glass, as also was the whole of the vertical side adjoining the defendant's property above a few feet from the ground. Portions of the glazed side of the conservatory were movable, so that when opened they overhung the defendant's property. The yearly rent was duly paid until 1888, when the conservatory was converted into a passage or corridor, the sloping top of the conservatory being retained and giving light to and forming the roof of the corridor. The defendant erected certain buildings which obstructed the access of light to the corridor through the glazed roof. The plaintiff brought an action for an injunction and damages.

Held, that the word "window" in the agreement referred to the sloping roof of the conservatory as well as the vertical side. Consequently the light was enjoyed only by virtue of the said agreement, which was a consent or agreement within the meaning of section 3 of the Prescription Act, and therefore the action failed.

Decision of Joyce, J. (50 W. R. 472), affirmed.—EASTON v. ISTED, C.A., 245; [1903] 1 Ch. 405; 72 L. J. Ch. 189; 87 L. T. 705.

2. Church way for inhabitants of parish—Custom—Prescription—Trespass—Mandatory injunction.—The regular usage for over twenty years of a church way by the inhabitants of a parish is sufficient to warrant the finding of the existence of an immemorial custom, and, in the absence of proper evidence limiting such usage to a particular class of the parishioners by virtue of a manorial custom or otherwise, the church way will be deemed to be for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish generally, to enable them to go to their parish church.

Any person within the custom would be entitled to a mandatory injunction to prevent the blocking up of a church way by the owner of the estate through which it passes.—BROOKLEBANK v. THOMPSON, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 344; 72 L. J. Ch. 626.

3. Light—Implied grant—Derogation from grant—Title of grantor to adjacent land—Leaseholds—Building agreement—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6 (2) (4) (5).—A builder entered into an agreement under which he was to be at liberty to enter upon certain plots of land for the purpose of building houses thereon. On the completion of each house a lease of the premises was to be granted him, but nothing in the agreement was to operate as a demise of any part of the land. A house was built and a lease duly granted to the builder, who assigned it to the plaintiffs. The builder subsequently erected, under the terms of the agreement, another house on an adjoining plot of land which interfered with the lights of the plaintiffs' house.

Held, that, as the builder had no such interest in the adjacent land as would have enabled him at the time of the assignment to the plaintiffs to grant them an easement of light over it, no action could be maintained by the plaintiffs against him on the ground of derogation from the grant of light implied in the assignment to them.—QUICKE v. CHAPMAN, C.A., 452; [1903] 1 Ch. 659; 72 L. J. Ch. 373; 88 L. T. 610.

4. Light—Threatened injury—Injunction or damages—Jurisdiction—Special circumstances—Oppression—Lord Cairns' Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), s. 2.—The plaintiff was the owner of a cottage possessing ancient lights and adjacent to ground whereon the defendant threatened and intended to erect valuable buildings which would (as the court found) materially obstruct the lights and cause the plaintiff substantial damage. The plaintiff had been unwilling to sell his property for a less sum than the cottage, together with its easement of light, would, having regard to its situation in relation to the adjacent ground, in fact command. In an action for an injunction to restrain the erection of the proposed building, Held, that the plaintiff's conduct had not been extortionate, and that there were no circumstances such as would induce the court to award him damages in lieu of an injunction.

The dictum in Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., 43 Ch. D. 316, 38 W. R. Dig. 63, that there is no jurisdiction to grant damages in lieu of a prohibitory injunction, must be considered binding.—COOPER v. LAIDLER, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 539; [1903] 2 Ch. 337; 72 L. J. Ch. 578.

5. Right of support—Conveyance—Implied reserva- tion—Easement of necessity—Right by prescription.—In 1861 the sides of a dock were, with the consent of the occupiers of an adjoining wharf, and also of the freeholders of both, supported by tie-rods which passed through the soil of the wharf and were fastened by nuts to piles. In 1877 the wharf was sold to the plaintiffs, but the conveyance contained no reservation of any right of support by the tie-rods. In 1886 the dock was sold to the predecessors in title of the defendants. In 1900 the plaintiffs, on making some excavations on their wharf, came across a number of the tie-rods and claimed the right to remove them, though they still supported the dock. No part of any of the rods was visible, except two nuts on the outside of certain piles on the plaintiffs' wharf, and the plaintiffs' had no knowledge of the existence of the rods until 1900.

Held (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting), that the support of the tie-rods was not such an easement of necessity that a reservation of such a right ought to be implied in the conveyance of 1877; that the rods did not form part of the corporeal structure of the dock so as not to have passed by the conveyance to the plaintiffs of the adjoining property; that the defendants had not acquired any easement against the plaintiffs by prescription, as the enjoyment of it had not been open, and the plaintiffs were not aware of it, and there were no circumstances sufficient to justify the court in holding that the plaintiffs ought to have such knowledge attributed to them, or were put on inquiry, and therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to remove the tie-rods.

Per Stirling, L.J.—The "easements of necessity" referred to in the judgments in Wheeldon v. Burrows, 41 L. T. Rep. 327, 12 Ch. Div. 31, as reserved by implication in favour of a grantor of land are easements without which the property retained cannot be used at all, and not those merely necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property.

Held (by Vaughan Williams, L.J.), that the tie-rods constituted a corporeal part of the dock, and were essential to its maintenance as it stood before and at the time of the conveyance, and therefore the right to keep them in the position in which they were was an easement of necessity which was reserved by implication on the conveyance of 1877; that under the circumstances, especially the fact that the two nuts were visible, the plaintiffs were put on inquiry, and knowledge of the presence of the tie-rods must be imputed to them, and therefore the defendants had also obtained that right by prescription. — UNION LIGHTERAGE CO. v. LONDON GRAVING DOCK CO., C.A.; [1902] 2 Ch. 557; 71 L. 6. Way enjoyed with the land sold—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6, sub-section 2.—The owner of two adjoining houses sold one to a purchaser who was already in occupation, and had at the date of the conveyance enjoyed a way over the premises retained by the vendor.

Held, that the purchaser was entitled to a right of way.

7. Way, Right of—Uninterrupted enjoyment for forty years—Enjoyment as of right—Parol licence—Prescription Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71).—The appellant brought an action to establish a claim to a right of way across the yard of an adjoining house belonging to the respondents. It was proved that the appellant and her predecessor in title had enjoyed the right of way openly and regularly for upwards of sixty years without interruption, and that a fixed sum per annum had been paid by them for more than forty years to the owner or occupier of the yard, but there was no evidence of the origin of the payment, or of any agreement in writing, or of any request for permission to use the way during the forty years before the action was brought.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the proper inference from the facts was that the enjoyment was not "as of right" within the meaning of the Prescription Act, 1832, but that each payment was for permission to use the way for the year, though no such permission was expressly asked for or granted; and that a lost grant subject to a perpetual quit rent could not be presumed. — GARDNER v. HODGSON'S KINGSTON BREWERY CO., H.L.; [1903] A. ELECTION LAW:—

1. Registration—Municipal franchise—Occupation list—Objection—Qualifying premises acquired during the qualifying period—"Promotion to an office"—Appointment of Wesleyan minister by the conference of the connexion—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 33 (1).—The appellant, a Wesleyan minister, was, in August, 1901, appointed by the Wesleyan Conference to the ministry of the Gloucester circuit in succession to a previous Wesleyan minister, and the appellant, in August, 1901, entered as such minister into the occupation of the manse, in the city of Gloucester, vacated by the outgoing minister. The manse, which was vested in trustees, was occupied by each successive minister, rent free, but the minister in occupation was personally liable for the rates. The appellant's name was entered in Division III. of the occupiers' list of voters of the city of Gloucester in respect of the said manse as a dwelling-house, and was objected to, on the ground that appellant had not in fact occupied the qualifying premises during the whole of the qualifying period. The appellant contended that he had succeeded to the qualifying property by "promotion to an office"—namely, the ministry of the Gloucester circuit, and that the occupancy and rating of the preceding minister was equivalent to the occupancy and rating of himself within section 33, sub-section 1, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. Save as aforesaid, no evidence was produced at the revision court of the terms of the deed of trust under which the qualifying property (the manse) was held. The revising barrister on the authority of Foster v. Mulhall held that the appointment to the ministry of the Gloucester circuit was not "promotion to an office" within the section, and accordingly allowed the objection and expunged the appellant's name. The appellant duly appealed, and the revising barrister, in stating a case, appended to the case as an exhibit the deed of trust under which the qualifying property was held, and added a note that this document was not produced in evidence at the revision court.

Held, that the court could not regard anything which was not in evidence before the revising barrister at the revision court; and that upon the evidence before him there was nothing to show that he had come to a wrong conclusion, and consequently that his decision must be affirmed.

2. Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Borough vote—Occupier's claim—Local Act—Alteration of boundaries of parish—Part of parish added to the City of London except for rating purposes—Metropolitan Meat and Poultry Market Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. cxiii.), s. 11—Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c 23), 6th Schedule.—Under the Metropolitan Meat Market Act, 1860, the Corporation of the City of London were authorised to take a certain portion of the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, in connection with the establishment of a meat market, and by section 11 of that Act it was provided that, except for the purposes of rating, the premises so taken should be deemed to be in the City of London, but that they should, nevertheless, continue to be rated in and to the parish of St. Sepulchre. By the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, Schedule VI., the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, was included in the East Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Finsbury.

The appellant, who was the occupier of a stall in the meat market on a portion of the above premises, claimed to have his name inserted in Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters for the East Division of the Parliamentary Borough of Finsbury, and his claim was objected to.

The revising barrister disallowed the claim, on the ground that, on the true construction of the Act of 1860, the qualifying premises ceased in 1860 to form part of the parish of St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, for the purposes of the electoral franchise, and that that was so notwithstanding the provision as to rating contained in section 11.

The Court affirmed his decision on the same grounds.—PICKARD v. PRESTON, K.B.D., 156.

3. Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Occupation claim—Disabilities—Volunteer absent on military service in South Africa—"During the continuance of the present war"—Declaration of peace—Electoral Disabilities (Military Service) Removal Act, 1900 (63 Vict c. 8), ss. 1, 3—Electoral Disabilities Removal Act, 1891 (54 Vict. c 11), s. 2.—The appellant, who claimed to be placed on the occupiers' list of electors for the parish of St. Clement's, Ipswich, had volunteered and was absent on military service in South Africa during the whole of the twelve months preceding the 15th of July, 1902. The claim was objected to. The revising barrister decided that, as peace was proclaimed in June, 1902, the appellant's case was not covered by section 1 (i.) of the Electoral Disabilities (Military Service) Removal Act, 1900, inasmuch as section 3 provided that the Act should apply only to absence during the continuance of the present war in South Africa; and he accordingly disallowed the claim.

Held, on appeal, reversing the revising barrister's decision, that whether or not the benefit of the Electoral Disabilities (Military Service) Removal Act, 1900, terminated immediately upon the proclamation of peace, the interval between the declaration of peace and the end of the qualifying period was covered by section 2 of the Electoral Disabilities Act, 1891.

Per Lord Alverstone, L.C.J.—That the whole of the qualifying period was covered by the Act of 1900, s. 1 (i.), as the word "during" in section 3 referred less to the mere continuance of the war than to the continuance of military service rendered necessary by the war.—MARSH v. By his will A. devised the said estate to trustees in trust for the use of B. when he should attain the age of twenty-five, or at such earlier period as the trustees should decide upon. The estate vested in B. who subsequently died intestate before the cestui que vie.

Held, that, on the death of B. intestate his interest in the estate pur autre vie devolved upon his administrator as part of his personal estate.—INMAN, RE, INMAN v. INMAN, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady. J., 188; [1903] 1 Ch. 241; 72 L. J. Ch. 120; 88 L. T. 173.

ESTOPPEL:—

Solicitor and Client—Conveyance to client prepared by solicitor—Portion of solicitor's property comprised—Negligence.—A person who relies on an estoppel by negligence must show that he was led into a belief on which he acted to his detriment.

A solicitor was ordered by his client to investigate the title to and prepare a conveyance of property adjoining his (the solicitor's) property. In the conveyance a small portion of the solicitor's property was comprised, but the client did not believe, nor was he led by the solicitor to believe, that he was buying the small portion in question. The client subsequently brought an action claiming the land.

Held, that the solicitor was not estopped from setting up the truth.—BELL v. MARSH, C.A., 325; [1903] 1 Ch. 528; 72 L. J. Ch. 360; 88 L. T. 605.

EXTRADITION—

Extradition treaty with Belgium—Fugitive criminal pleads an alibi—More evidence to support defence forthcoming since committal—Jurisdiction of the court to consider such evidence—Habeas corpus—Procedure—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 10, 11.—In an extradition case where a magistrate has jurisdiction to commit, and where there is any evidence to justify a committal, the court has no jurisdiction to review the question whether the magistrate had properly exercised his discretion or not.

Therefore, the court can only on an application for a habeas corpus entertain the question of the jurisdiction of the magistrate to commit under sections 10 and 11 of the Extradition Act, 1870, and decide whether the crime charged comes within the Act or whether it is an offence of a political character, and the question whether there was evidence to support the magistrate's decision.

The fact that there is fresh evidence forthcoming which was not before the magistrate, and which might have affected his mind. is no ground for granting a habeas corpus.—REX v. HOLLOWAY PRISON (GOVERNOR OF). SILETTI, EX PARTE, K.B.D., 191; 71 L. J. K. B. 935; 87 L. T. 332.

FACTORY—

1. Engine-house in workhouse—Machinery for generating electrical energy—Public building.—Upon the premises of a workhouse under the control of the appellants were an engine-house and machinery used for the purpose of generating electrical energy for the lighting of the workhouse and for other purposes. The machinery included an engine, which was not securely fenced.

Held, that the engine-house was a "factory" within the meaning of section 149, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the workhouse being a "public building" within Part I. (20), of the Sixth Schedule, and that the appellants were therefore properly convicted of not having securely fenced the engine.—MILE END OLD TOWN GUARDIANS v. HOARE, K.B.D.; 72 L. J K. B. 651.

2. Two separate factories in one building—Common owner—Works required for protection from fire of both factories—Right of entry of owner to execute works—Validity of notice—"Tenement factory"—"Power supplied"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 22), ss. 14 (2) (7), 149 (1).—Separate factories within the same building do not together constitute a tenement factory within section 149 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, unless the mechanical power which is supplied to them is supplied from a common source.

Where two separate factories in the same building which do not together constitute a tenement factory have a common owner, the owner has no right under section 14 of that Act, as against the occupier of one factory, to enter on that factory to do works which are reasonably required for the protection from fire of the other factory by reason of the fact that works are also reasonably required for the protection of the factory on which he proposes to enter, even though such works are the same (or nearly the same) for both factories.

A building contained two separate factories, each supplying its own mechanical power. The local authority, purporting to act under section 14 (2) of the Act, served on the owner of the building a notice requiring him to construct certain works for the protection from fire of the two factories jointly.

Held, that the notice was invalid, because (1) the two factories did not constitute a tenement factory, and were not, therefore, one factory within section 14 (2); and (2) it did not specify what works were required for the protection of both factories considered separately.

Held, consequently, that the owner had no power, as against the occupier of one factory, to enter his premises to execute works required for the protection of the other factory.—TOLLER v. SPIERS & POND, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 381; [1903] 1 Ch. 191; 72 L. J. Ch. 191; 87 L. T. 578.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT:—

Governor of prison—Clerk of the peace—Action against governor and clerk of the peace—Governor receiving prisoner without proper warrant of commitment—Warrant by magistrate—Sentence altered on appeal by quarter sessions—No fresh warrant by quarter sessions—Liability of governor and clerk of peace—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 27.—The plaintiff was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction and sentenced to a term of imprisonment with hard labour. He was taken to prison under a warrant of commitment made out by the magistrate, but released pending an appeal to quarter sessions. The conviction was affirmed, but the sentence was altered. No fresh warrant of commitment was made out by the recorder at quarter sessions, but the original conviction by the magistrate was altered by the recorder in accordance with his sentence. The plaintiff was then taken to prison, and the only documents handed to the governor of the prison were a copy of the original conviction by the magistrate as altered by the recorder and the original warrant of commitment by the magistrate. He was detained in prison for some days, when the conviction was quashed upon other grounds, and he was released.

In an action for false imprisonment against the clerk of the peace of the borough and the governor of the prison for unlawfully imprisoning the plaintiff,

Held, that the action could not be maintained against the clerk of the peace, as he was merely a ministerial officer, and his act was a ministerial act; but that the action was maintainable against the governor, as he was not justified in receiving the plaintiff into custody and detaining him without a fresh warrant of commitment by the recorder, and that the documents which the governor received were not equivalent to such warrant of commitment, and that the governor was liable in damages to the plaintiff.—DEMER v. COOK, K.B.D.; 88 L. FIXTURES:—

1. Machinery affixed to freehold by bolts and screws—Presumption of law—Hire-purchase agreement—Rights of mortgagees in possession as against owner of machinery.—The plaintiff supplied certain machines on the hire-purchase system to the lessee of a factory, and by his workmen fixed them on concrete beds, in which were iron uprights to which the machines were fastened by screws and bolts and nuts. By the hire-purchase agreement the lessee was to make certain periodical payments, and until the whole of the payments were made the machines were to remain the property of the plaintiff; and, further, it was agreed that if the lessee made default in punctual payment of any instalment the plaintiff was to have the power to determine the hiring and remove the machines. Prior to the hiring of the machinery the lessee had mortgaged the factory. The lessee made default in payment of the instalments under the hire-purchase agreement, whereupon the plaintiff gave notice determining the hiring and demanding the return of the machinery. A few days previously, however, to this the mortgagees had entered into possession of the premises under their mortgage, and they refuse to give up the machines, claiming them as fixtures.

In an action brought by the plaintiff against the mortgagees to recover the machines or their value, Lawrance, J., held, on the authority of Hobson v. Gorringe, 45 W. R. 356, [1897] 1 Ch. 182, that the machines were fixtures, and refused to leave any question to the jury.

Held, that the decision of the learned judge was right.

Assignment to trustee for creditors — Deed of arrangement — Registration — Affidavit — List of creditors—Omission—Intentional exclusion of particular creditor—Delaying creditors—Bona fides—13 Eliz. c. 5—Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), ss. 5, 6.—A deed of arrangement is not necessarily void under section 5 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, because in the affidavit by the debtor filed on registration, under section 6, sub-section 1, the name of a particular creditor is omitted.

A deed of assignment to a trustee for creditors is not necessarily void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, because the debtor intentionally excluded a particular creditor from the benefits of the deed.

Where a deed of assignment to a trustee for creditors is impeached as being void under 13 Eliz. c. 5, the test is whether the deed was really a bonâ fide deed for the benefit of creditors or whether its object was to benefit the debtor at the expense of the creditors.

GAMING:—

1. Betting—Coupon competitions—Advertisement—Use of newspaper office for betting by advertiser—Liability of proprietor of newspaper—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3.—M., the proprietor of a newspaper called Football Chat, was the occupier of an office in Bedford-street, Strand, where his newspaper was published. T. had an office at Middelburg, in Holland, where he conducted sporting coupon competitions, which, by agreement between T. and M., were advertised week by week in the latter's paper. The advertisements contained offers of money prizes for correct guesses as to the winners of football matches, and offered coupons at certain rates to intending competitors. Appended to the advertisements were coupon sheets, which might be filled up, and were directed to be sent, with postal order, to Football Chat, Middelburg, Holland. M. was paid by T. for these advertisements a much higher price than the ordinary rate charged for advertisements, and was also paid at the ordinary rate for publishing the names of the prize-winners; but M. did not share in the profits of the coupon competition. The postal orders were returned to England and collected by a bank and placed to the credit of T.

Held, that there was evidence that T. was a person using the office of M.'s newspaper for the purpose of money being received by T. as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the event of a game within the meaning of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and that M. was a person knowingly and wilfully permitting his office to be used as aforesaid within the meaning of section 3 of the said Act.—MACKENZIE v. HAWKE, K.B.D., 233; [1902] 2 K. Held, that M. was liable to be convicted upon a summons under section 7 of the Betting Act, 1853.

M. also published an advertisement in his paper whereby it appeared that two other persons, whose addresses were given, respectively would, on application, give information for the purpose of or with respect to certain bets, wagers, events, or contingencies mentioned in the Betting Act, 1853.

Held, that M. was liable to be convicted of an offence under section 3, sub-section 1, of the Betting Act, 1874.

Held, that the bookmaker used the bar for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, contrary to the provisions of section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853.

It must be shown that the defendant had something in the nature of a right or license to use the place for the purpose of his betting business over and above the right of an ordinary member of the public to resort thereto.—REX v. DEAVILLE, C.C.R., 604; [1903] 1 K. 5. Using shop for unlawful game—Automatic machine—Unlawful gaming—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 2—Gaming House Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 38), s. 4.—The appellant kept in his shop an automatic machine which was worked by putting a penny in the slot and then pulling down and afterwards releasing a spring, whereby the penny was set in motion and might fall into one of seven compartments; if it fell into the centre compartment a ticket was automatically delivered entitling the recipient to two pennyworth of goods sold in the shop, if it fell into two other compartments the penny was automatically returned, but if it fell into any of the other four compartments it was retained.

Held, that the user of such machine was an unlawful game within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 2, and the Gaming House Act. 1854, and that the appellant had been rightly convicted under section 4 of the latter Act of having opened, kept, and used his shop for the purpose of unlawful gaming.—FIELDING v. TURNER, K.B.D., 543; [1903] 1 K. GAS:—

1. Arrears of gas rent due by outgoing tenant—Purchase by incoming tenant of outgoing tenant's business and interest in premises—Right to recover from incoming tenant—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15), s. 16—Metropolis Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c 125), s. 39—Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act. 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. xxiii.), s. 18.—By section 18 of the Gas Light and Coke Co.'s Act, 1872, it is provided that "in case any consumer leave the premises where gas was supplied to him without paying to the company the rate or meter rent due from him, the company shall not require from the next tenant of the premises payment of arrears so left unpaid, unless the incoming tenant agreed with the defaulting consumer to pay such arrears, or unless the incoming tenant shall continue the trade or business of the outgoing tenant and shall have paid to the owner, lessee, or mortgagee in possession or to the outgoing tenant of such premises a consideration for so doing; but the company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears, in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant, as required by this Act, on being required by him to do so."

Held, that, by virtue of the above section, arrears of rent left due for gas supplied to a tenant of premises who has sold the lease thereof and the goodwill of the business he carried thereon to an incoming tenant, who continued the trade or business of the outgoing tenant on the said premises, may be recovered by action by the gas company from the incoming tenant.

2. London County Council—Power to test gas on Sundays—"Daily."—A series of Acts of Parliament commencing in 1868 provided for the "daily" testing of the defendant company's gas in respect of illuminating power, pressure, and purity by the officers of the Metropolitan Board of Works, whose powers in this respect were transferred to the London County Council. There was no express exclusion of Sundays in any one of the Acts, but it appeared that throughout the period from 1868 down to 1903, when the county council claimed the right to test on Sundays, the practice had been to test on weekdays only.

Held, upon the construction of the word "daily" in the statute, that the primâ facie meaning of "daily" being "every day of the week," no artificial meaning for the word had been created by the practice which had hitherto obtained, and that the London County Council were none the less entitled to test on Sundays by reason of themselves and their predecessors not having chosen to do so in the past.—LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. SOUTH METROPOLITAN GAS CO., *Ch.D. 1. Bridge over canal—Raised approaches to bridge—Liability to repair fences—10 Geo. 4, c. 48.—A canal company liable to repair bridges and the "wing walls, ramparts, and side banks thereof," but not liable to repair "roads approaching bridges" beyond the extremity of the wing walls thereof, is not liable to repair the fences on the raised approaches to bridges.

2. Level crossing over railway—Alteration of inclination of road—Liability of local authority to keep in repair raised parts of highway—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 16, 56.—Where a railway company crosses a highway on a higher level than the road and necessarily has to construct a permanent inclined plane on each side of the railway so as to admit of vehicles using the crossing, section 16 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, does not cast the duty of maintaining and repairing the approaches upon the railway company.—WEST LANCASHIRE RURAL

COUNCIL v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY, K.B.D., 694.

3. New street—Ownership of soil—Adjoining owner—Presumption of ownership usque ad medium filum viæ —Rebutting evidence.—The owners of land abutting on a road or street are only presumed to own the land usque ad medium filum viæ in the absence of facts to disprove such presumption.

Land was taken by commissioners under an Act of Parliament for the purpose of making a new street, and the Act gave the commissioners power to lease the premises abutting on the new street not wanted for the purposes of the Act, but it was doubtful whether this gave the commissioners power to lease the soil of the street. The commissioners leased one of the houses to the plaintiff's predecessor, and in the lease the property was described as abutting on the new street.

Held, that the presumption that the soil of the adjoining street usque ad medium filum viæ passed with such lease was rebutted by the circumstances of the case, regard being had to the provisions of the Act and the terms of the lease.—MAPPIN BROTHERS v. LIBERTY & CO, *Ch.D. 4. Public footpath—Right of passage—Public footpath through lane of varying breadth between fences—Presumption as to extent of public right—User—Evidence.—Where a public footpath passes through a lane of irregular shape containing a private occupation road and of varying breadth between the fences, there is no presumption, as there is in the case of an ordinary public highway bounded by fences, that the public right extends to the whole space between the fences. The question how far in such cases the public right extends depends upon the evidence in each particular case, and the mere fact that the public in passing through the lane have been accustomed, without objection, to walk upon the greensward or strips of grass land between the fences does not show that any such presumption exists, or that the public right extends to the fences. —FORD v. HARROW URBAN COUNCIL, K.B.D.; 88 L. HUSBAND AND WIFE:

1. Authority of wife to pledge husband's credit—Necessaries—Action against husband and wife jointly, severally, and in the alternative — Presumption of agency—Presumption of authority to pledge joint credit—Judgment against wife—Right to proceed against husband—Election—Practice—Ord. 14, r. 5.—A husband, by arrangement with his wife, made an annual allowance of a substantial sum for the expenses of their household. Tradesmen who supplied goods for the use of the household on the orders of the wife sued the husband and wife for the price, claiming against them jointly. The plaintiffs obtained judgment against the wife under order 14 and proceeded with the action against the husband.

Held, that the ordinary presumption that a wife has authority to pledge her husband's credit for necessaries was rebutted.

Held, also, that, even if any such presumption could be made, at any rate the presumption that the wife had authority to pledge the joint credit of her husband and herself could not be made.

Held, also, that, if the plaintiff's claim could be amended by adding a claim against the defendants severally or in the alternative, the plaintiffs, having obtained judgment on their several claim against the wife, were debarred from setting up an inconsistent claim against the husband.

The special provision contained in ord. 14, r. 5, that a plaintiff who has obtained judgment under that order against one of two defendants may proceed with the action against the other, does not apply where the plaintiff claims against the defendants in the alternative.—MOREI BROTHERS v. WESTMORLAND (EARL), C.A., 290; [1903] 1 K. The policy was expressed to be "for the benefit of his wife, or if she be dead between his children in equal proportions." The wife died, having had four more children after the issue of the policy. The assured subsequently married again, and had one child by his second wife. On his death, leaving his widow and nine children him surviving,

Held, that the widow was not entitled to participate in the policy moneys, but that they went to the children of the first and second marriages in equal shares.

An infant member of a building society purchased a piece of land by means of a loan from the society, paid to the vendor, and gave the society a mortgage to secure the loan and further advances, which were expended in building operations on the land.

Held, that the mortgage was void under the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, but that the society were entitled to a charge on the land for the purchase-money paid to the vendor, together with interest at 4 per cent. on that amount.

2. Custody of child—Paternity—Evidence.—In the case of a child born in wedlock, as to whose paternity questions are raised upon an application as to the child's custody, if the husband could, from circumstances of time, place, and health, have had nuptial intercourse with his wife, the mother of the child, and it be not proved that he did not have such intercourse, he must be considered the father of her child, even if she were shown to have committed adultery with any number of men.

Sexual intercourse between man and wife must be presumed, and nothing except evidence that the husband did not have such intercourse at the period of conception can bastardize a child born in wedlock.

INJUNCTION:—

Jurisdiction—Attorney-General—Public right—New statutory offence—Special statutory remedy—Bye-laws—Penalties—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 157, 183, 251.—The Attorney-General is entitled to an injunction, as an ancillary remedy, to restrain the breach of a public right in the same way as a private person is so entitled in respect of a breach of his private rights; and this is so in a case where the public right has been created by a statute which also provides a special remedy for its breach, as, for instance, the recovery of a penalty in a summary way.

An urban district council having, by its bye-laws, prescribed (amongst other things) the width of new streets under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and imposed penalties for offences against the bye-laws under section 183, which penalties were, by section 251, to be recovered before a court of summary jurisdiction, the Attorney-General at the relation of the council brought an action in the High Court against the defendant, who had contravened the bye-laws, for an injunction.

INLAND REVENUE:—

1. Estate duty—Gift of personal property—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2, sub-section 1 (c).—In pursuance of a bargain made between the father of the defendant, who was shortly about to marry, and the father of the intended bride, the latter agreed to settle the sum of £20,000 on his daughter on condition that the former would give his son the sum of £10 000. This sum was accordingly given to the defendant by his father, the marriage settlement was executed, and the marriage was subsequently solemnized. Within twelve months of the date of his gift to his son the father died.

Held, that there had been a gift of the £10,000, and that estate duty under section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, 1894, was payable by the defendant in respect of it.

Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99, and Attorney-General v. Johnson, ante, p. 487. [1903] 1 K. B. 617, followed.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HOLDEN, K.B.D., 685; [1903] 1 K. B. 832; 72 L. J. K. B. 420; 88 L. T. 729.

2. Estate duty—Incidence in respect of appointed fund—Residue—Testamentary expense—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2, sub-section 1; s 6, sub section 2; s. 8, sub-sections 3, 4; s. 9, sub-sections 1, 4.—Where an executor receives personal property, appointed in pursuance of a general power, this property constitutes "assets which he has received as executor" within the meaning of section 8 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894. Assets which a person rightfully receives as executor are assets which pass to him as executor, within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, even although not strictly speaking assets to which he is entitled virtute oficii.

The estate duty is payable out of the residue and not out of the appointed funds. Estate duty is a testamentary expense.—FERNSIDE, RE, BAINES v. CHADWICK, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 186; [1903] 1 Ch. 250; 72 L. J. Ch. 200; 87 L. T. 57.

3. Estate duty—Incidence—Settled property—Pecuniary and residuary legatees—Finance Act. 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 8 (4), 9 (1) (5) (6), 14 (1).—In respect of property, of which the deceased was not competent to dispose, the scheme of the Finance Act, 1894, is to tax, not the interest which ceased with the death, but the property out of which the interest was enjoyed, and to make every person who takes property otherwise than through the executor liable to pay a proportionate part of the estate duty. Accordingly, where property, real and personal, was left upon trust for conversion and to pay an annuity to the testator's widow for life, and after her death upon trust to pay legacies amounting to £9,000 and to divide the residue among persons named,

Held, by the Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of Buckley, J., that under section 8 (4) of the Finance Act, 1894, the estate duty, which became payable on the death of the widow (who died in 1900), should be borne rateably both by the pecuniary legatees and the residuary legatees; and, consequently, that the pecuniary legatees were not entitled to throw the entire duty upon the residue.—BERRY v. GAUKROGER, C.A., 449; [1903] 2 Ch. 116; 72 L. —Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 9 (5).—Though a tenant for life may properly exercise the option given by sub-section 8 of section 6 of the Finance Act, 1894, of paying estate duty by instalments, and thereby incur the obligation of paying interest on the unpaid instalments, he is not, as between himself and the remainderman, relieved by the exercise of such option from his duty to keep down interest on charges, and cannot charge such interest on the inheritance as "interest properly incurred by him" under sub-section 5 of section 9 of the Act.—HOWE'S (EARL) SETTLED ESTATES, RE, C.A., 468; [1903] 2 Ch. 69; 72 L. 5. Estate duty—Policy of insurance—Settled property—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2 (1) (d).—In 1866 Sir H. P. effected a policy of assurance on his son's life, C. E. P. (who was born in the year 1855). All the premiums were paid by the father. In 1884 C. E. P. married, and the policy was brought into his marriage settlement by Sir H. P., with the approbation of C. E. P. In 1897 Sir H. P. died, and in 1900 Sir C. E. P. died, and the insurance company paid the amount of the policy to the trustees of the settlement. The Crown claimed duty in respect of the policy on the death of Sir C. E. P. as property passing on his death.

Held, that the policy fell within the words of section 2, sub-section 1 (d), as being an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased . . . in concert or by arrangement with any other person, and that the fact that the policy was void under 14 Geo. 3, c. 43, did not affect the matter, as the insurance company had paid the policy money.

6. Estate duty — Settled property—Mortgage by tenant for life and remainderman—Indemnity to tenant for life—Value of property passing on death of tenant for life—Equity of redemption—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1; s. 2, sub-section 1 (h); s. 7.—An estate was settled by will upon a tenant for life with remainder to a second tenant for life, with remainder in fee. The first tenant for life and the remaindermen mortgaged the estate in fee as security for an advance to the remaindermen, who alone covenanted with the mortgagee to repay the advance and interest thereon. By an indenture of even date the remaindermen covenanted to indemnify the first tenant for life against any liability or loss and against any claims or proceedings in respect of the mortgage debt, and they conveyed an annuity to trustees as security for the performance of the covenant. The first tenant for life was in fact kept indemnified against any claim upon her or her estate. On the death in 1895 of the first tenant for life the Crown claimed estate duty under section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the estate, without deducting the amount of the mortgage debt, as property passing on the death of the tenant for life, on the ground that the tenant for life, by reason of the indemnity, had been beneficially interested in the estate to its full value.

Held, that estate duty was only payable on the principal value of the estate after deducting the mortgage debt.

The commercial value of the annuity was £210. The annuity was not charged on the funds of the society, but was paid by the directors as one of the ordinary outgoings of the society to B. during his life and after his death to his widow during her life. B. died in 1895, and his widow in 1900.

Held, that the society were liable to pay estate duty on the whole sum of £500 on the death of B. under section 2, sub-section 1 (c), of the Finance Act, 1894, and were also liable to pay succession duty on the same sum on the death of the widow, under section 7 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853.

9. House duty—School buildings—"Other offices"—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Schedule B—House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36).—The appellant was the occupier of a dwelling-house and premises, which he used for the purposes of a boarding school. He also occupied adjacent buildings, which were separated from the first-mentioned premises by a wall. There was a door in the wall through which, by means of a covered-in passage, there was communication between the premises on each side of the wall. The adjacent buildings were respectively used as a chapel, a gymnasium, classrooms, fives court, and for such-like school purposes in connection with the boarding school, other than the ordinary purposes of a dwelling-house.

Held (reversing the judgment of Phillimore, J.), that the adjacent buildings must be included in the valuation of the premises for the purposes of inhabited house duty, as being offices belonging to and occupied with the dwelling-house within the meaning of rule 2 of Schedule B of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55.—BROWNE v. FURTADO, C.A.; [1903] 1 K. Held, that the tax was not payable on that portion which represented the payment of capital.

11. Income tax—Banking company—Purchase of banking business—Business "set up and commenced" within three years—Succession to business.—The respondents acquired under an agreement the S. Bank, which had for some years carried on its business at W. The business of the S. Bank was carried on for some months after the purchase for the benefit of the respondents. The premises then became a branch of the respondent bank. All new cheque books and pass books were in the name of the respondent bank. From the date of the purchase the profits, if any, earned at the W. branch merged in and formed part of the general profits of the respondent bank, and there were no means of ascertaining whether there were any profits or the proportion of increase or decrease in the profits of the bank which had arisen from the purchase of the business. The general assessments of the respondent bank for the two years succeeding the purchase included some portion of the profits made by the W. branch, if any were made, but it was impossible to distinguish between such profits and the general profits of the bank. In the three years preceding the purchase the S. Bank had made certain profits, and additional assessments were made upon the respondent bank, being assumed profits made by them based on the average of the profits of the S. Bank of such three preceding years.

Held, first, that the business carried on by the respondents was not "set up and commenced" within the period of three years within the terms of the first proviso of rule 1 of the first case of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1842; secondly, that the respondents had not "succeeded to any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern" within the meaning of the fourth rule applicable to the first and second case in Schedule D; thirdly, that the business carried on by the respondents was their old business, enlarged by their acquisition of the S. Bank, and that they were only liable to be assessed upon the three years' average prescribed by rule 1 of the first case.—BELL v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND, K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. 12. Income tax—Benefice, Incumbent of—Perquisites or profits accruing by reason of office—Gran by affiliated branch of Queen Victoria Clergy Sustentation Fund—Public office or employment of profit—Income Tax Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146; 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule E.—The appellant, a beneficed clergyman, received for several years an annual grant of money from a diocesan branch affiliated to the Queen Victoria Clergy Sustentation Fund, a body incorporated with the object of providing adequate remuneration for the beneficed clergy for the work done by them; the fund was not intended to be merely a clerical charity. The funds of the diocesan branch were administered by a council whose aim was to raise the incomes of all benefices under £200 per annum in value to that amount. The council did not take into consideration the personal circumstances of the particular incumbent, but the onus rested upon the applicant of deciding whether his own circumstances justified him in applying for a grant. The incumbent of a benefice of less than £200 a year was not necessarily entitled to a grant, but the giving, withholding, continuance, and discontinuance of grants out of the funds were matters wholly within the discretion of the council. Where a benefice fell vacant during the year for which the grant was made, the grant was divided between the outgoing and incoming incumbent in proportion to the length of time for which each had been incumbent.

Held (reversing the decision of a Divisional Court, [1901] 2 K. B. 761), that the grants received by the incumbent from the diocesan branch were "perquisites or profits accruing by reason of his office" within the meaning of the first rule contained in section 146 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, for charging duties under Schedule E, and that he was therefore liable to pay income tax under Schedule E upon them.—HERBERT v. MCQUADE, C.A.; [1902] 2 K. 14. Income tax—Colonial investments; Interest from—Remittances not identified as capital—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D case 4.—By section 100 of the Income Tax Act of 1842 it is provided that the duty chargeable under Schedule D, case 4, in respect of interest from "securities" in the Colonies, &c., is to be computed on the sums which have been, or will be, received in Great Britain in the current year.

A mutual life assurance society with its head office in Edinburgh, and where its management was exclusively vested in directors, sent to Australia for investment down to the end of 1898 a total sum of £1,504,000. The total remittances made to this country to the same date was £716,500, while the total funds in Australia, including accumulated interest and deducting all Australian expenses to the same date, was £1,822,207. The funds still remaining in Australia thus exceeded by £318,207 the sums sent there for investment. The amount remitted to this country from Australia in 1898 was £217,350. All this except £5,000 was intermixed with the society's funds in Australia, and the society did not show in their statement that the balance of £212,350 was in fact capital sent home.

Held, affirming the decision of the First Division of the Court of Session ([1901] 3 F. 874), that the Income Tax Commissioners had rightly charged the £212,350 with income tax.—SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION v. ALLAN, H.L.; [1903] A. C. 129; 72 L. J. P. C. 70; 88 L. T. 478.

15. Income tax — Company resident in United Kingdom hold 98 per cent. of shares in foreign company—Control—Liability to pay income tax on profits made by foreign company—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, case 1—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.—The respondent company was incorporated in England and registered under the Companies Acts to acquire (inter alia) not less than 95 per cent., and did in fact acquire 98 per cent. of the share capital of a foreign company, the remaining 2 per cent. being held by shareholders abroad independantly of the English company.

Held, that the respondent company was not assessable under Schedule D, case 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, to income tax upon the full amount of the profits of the foreign company as the Crown contended, because there was no evidence to rebut the respondent's contention that their interest in the foreign company was simply that of a shareholder, that they did not direct and control the foreign company, and that there was no such relationship of principal and agent or of master and servant existing between the two companies as to make the respondents liable under the claim put forward by the Crown.

16. Income tax—Deductions—Premium on life insurance—Advance by insurance company of half premium—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 54, Schedules D and E.—By the terms of a policy of life insurance it was provided that, if the assured should so desire, a portion of the premium—viz., £33, should in each year be advanced by the insurance company, and that the money so advanced should, with interest thereon, be a first charge on the policy. The premium was expressed to be £66 17*s.* 6d. The assured paid in respect of premium each year £33 17s. 6d., and obtained a receipt for £66 17s. 6d., the balance of £33 being advanced as provided for by the policy.

Held, that, under section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, the assured was not entitled to deduct from his assessment to income tax the sum of £66 17s. 6d., as the amount of the annual premium paid by him for life insurance, but only the sum of £33 17s. 6d.

Judgment of Phillimore, J. (50 W. R. 618, [1902] 2 K. B. 255), reversed.—HUNTER v. REX, C.A., 489; [1903] 1 K. B. 514; 72 L. J. K. B. 230; 88 L. T. 184.

17. Income tax—Salary—Deductions—Sum payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, rr. 1, 9, Schedule E—Manchester Corporation Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. ccvii.), ss. 5, 7.—The Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, empowered the corporation to establish a fund for encouraging thrift amongst their officers and servants, and to frame a scheme under which every person who contributed to the fund should on retirement be entitled to receive back the whole amount of his contributions with interest, and in case of his death his representatives should be entitled to receive the same. The scheme made under this power provided that persons entering the service of the corporation after the passing of the Act should contribute to the fund a certain percentage of their salaries or wages, to be deducted by the corporation, and that persons who were in the service of the corporation at the passing of the Act might, on application, be admitted to the benefit of the fund and become contributors, and that no contributor should cease to contribute while in the service of the corporation.

Held, affirming the judgment of Phillimore, J., in Hudson v. Gribble, 50 W. R. 557, [1902] 2 K. B. 298, and reversing his judgment in Bell v. Gribble, that a servant of the corporation who contributed to the fund, whether compulsorily or on his own application, was not entitled, under the first rule of section 146 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, to have the amount of his contribution deducted from his assessment to income tax under Schedule E.

18. Income tax—Ship owned by company and other persons—Two assessments.—The S. Steamship Co. owned the steamship B. and fifty-nine sixty-fourths of the steamship G., the remaining five sixty-fourths being owned by other persons.

Held, that the company was rightly assessed by two assessments, one in respect of the steamship B. and the other in respect of the steamship G., as the latter was an adventure carried on by them jointly with other persons within the third rule, applying to both the first and second cases to section 100 of the Income Tax Act, 1842.—FARRELL v. SUNDERLAND STEAMSHIP CO., K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 741.

19. Inhabited house duty—Exemption—House let in different tenements.—A bank was the owner of a building, the basement and ground floor of which they occupied themselves for the purposes of the bank. The first and second floors were let to a firm of solicitors under a lease restricting the use of them to business purposes. The third and fourth floors were occupied as residences by the bank manager and a caretaker. Access to the first and other floors was obtained by a staircase from the street. There was also a door leading from the bank on the ground floor to this staircase. The door was kept locked, but the manager had a key so that he could pass from his residence to the bank without going outside the building.

Held, that the bank were liable to be assessed to inhabited house duty in respect of the whole building.—LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK v. SMITH, H L.; 87 L. T. 244.

20. Stamp duty — Company — Consolidation of debenture stock—Issue of loan capital—Finance Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 9), s. 8.—By the special Act of the defendant company, three different debenture stocks of the company, being respectively 3 per cent., 4 per cent., and 4¼ per cent. stock, and amounting to £411,852, were extinguished, and in lieu thereof there was created a new 3 per cent. debenture stock. The holders of the original 3 per cent. stock received the same nominal amount of the new stock, and the holders of the 4 per cent. and 4¼ per cent. stocks received new stock to such nominal amount as at the rate of 3 per cent. would yield to the holder the same amount as was payable in respect of the stock previously held. The amount of the new debenture stock requisite to carry out the Act was £529,136, and stock to this amount was inscribed in the names of the persons entitled thereto, and certificates were issued in exchange for the old certificates.

Held, that the company had not proposed to "issue any loan capital" within the meaning of section 8 of the Finance Act, 1899, and that the stamp duty imposed by that section was not payable.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. REGENT'S CANAL AND DOCK CO., K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. tincture of quinine. He affixed to it a label stating that it was a well-known and highly recommended remedy for influenza.

Held, that he was not the "owner, proprietor, original or first vendor" of the medicine in question within the meaning of the schedule, 52 Geo. 3, c. 150, and that therefore he was not liable to stamp duty as having held out or recommended the medicine.—FARMER v. GLYN JONES, K.B.D., 524; [1903] 2 K. 22. Stamp duty—Mortgage—Collateral, auxiliary, or additional security—Trust deed for securing debentures—Subsequent conveyance of property to trustees—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s 86, Schedule I., "Mortgage."—By a trust deed for securing debentures in a limited company, the company acknowledged that it was indebted to the trustees in the sum of £750,000, and agreed to convey to the trustees certain freehold hereditaments, which were described in the deed as "the specifically mortgaged premises." At the date of the execution of the trust deed the hereditaments had not been conveyed to the company. After their conveyance to the company the latter conveyed them to the trustees to hold them upon the trusts contained in the trust deed. The conveyance contained no obligation by the company to pay the moneys secured by the trust deed or any part thereof. The trust deed was stamped at the rate of 2s. 6d. per £100 of the amount secured, as a primary security under the heading "Mortgage, bond, debenture, covenant" in Schedule I., clause 1, in the Stamp Act, 1891.

Held, that the conveyance was a "a collateral or auxiliary, or additional security, or by way of further assurance" within clause 2 of the heading "Mortgage," &c., and was therefore liable to stamp duty at the rate of 6d. per £100 of the amount secured by the trust deed.—BRITISH OIL AND CAKE MILLS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS, C.A., 388; [1903] 1 K. INSURANCE:—

1. Accident—"Intervening cause"—Construction of policy.—A person insured himself with the defendants under a policy whereby the defendants agreed to pay him a certain sum in case he should be injured by accidental violence and should die within three months of its occurrence, if the injury should be the "direct and sole cause" of his death. The policy was subject to the condition that it should not apply to "death . . . caused by or arising wholly or in part from" any "intervening cause." The assured on the 2nd of July accidentally inflicted a wound on his leg with his thumbnail. His leg became inflamed, and on the 9th of July erysipelas had set in. This was followed on the 12th of July by septicæmia, and on the 16th of July by septic pneumonia, of which complaint he died on the 22nd of July. It was conceded by the defendants that the septic germs, the development of which resulted in the man's death, were introduced into his system at the time of the infliction of the wound.

Held, that the erysipelas, septicæmia, and septic pneumonia were not "intervening causes" within the meaning of the policy, but merely different stages in the development of the septic condition which was immediately brought about by the introduction of the poison, and that the man's death was directly and solely caused by the accidental injury to his leg.—MARDORF v. ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO., K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. B. 584; 72 L. J. K. B. 362; 88 L. T. 330.

2. Accident — Master and servant — Notice of accident—Delay by employer to give notice until notice of claim by workman was sent in—Award in favour of workman under Act of 1897—Insurance company's liability to indemnify employer.—The appellants took out a policy of insurance against liability in respect of injury to any workman in their employ under (inter alia) the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, with the respondent company.

Clause 3 of the policy provided that the employer was "to give immediate notice to the company of any accident causing injury to a workman," and that "time should be the essence of this condition." At the foot of the policy there was a notification that every notice to be given by the assured should be in writing sent by post to, or delivered at, the head office of the company.

An accident having happened to a workman of the appellants on the 10th of October, 1900, on the 16th of October the appellants notified the fact of the accident by telephone to the person who had introduced the insurance company to them. The appellants received a notice in writing from the workman of his intention to claim compensation on the 1st of December, 1900, and they forwarded that notice to the respondent company on the 4th of December.

An award under the Act of 1897 having been made in favour of the workman, the appellants, the employers, claimed to be indemnified by the insurance company.

Held, that the giving of immediate notice of the accident was a condition precedent to the employers' right to indemnity under the policy, that the communication to the person who had introduced the appellants to the company was no notice to the company at all, and that under the circumstances the company were not liable.—WILLIAMS AND LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE INSURANCE CO.'S ARBITRATION, RE, K.B.D., 222.

3. Bullion—Detainments of foreign government—"Free of capture, seizure, and detainments"—Seizure by enemy of property of its own subject—Commandeering of gold.—The plaintiffs, a gold mining company incorporated under the laws of the South African Republic, insured gold whilst on transit from the mine to the United Kingdom with the defendants against arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings, princes, and people. The policy contained this clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of riots, civil commotions, hostilities, or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war." While in transit the gold was seized at the frontier under orders from the Government of the South African Republic. At that time war had not been declared against Great Britain, but the commandoes had been called out, and evidence was given that the seizure was in accordance with the laws of the Republic.

Held, that the defendants were not liable, as the loss was caused by "seizure" within the meaning of the exception in the policy.

4. Bullion—Seizure of gold by foreign government—Subsequent declaration of war—Insurance of enemy's property—An insurance by a British subject of an alien's goods effected before war actually breaks out between this country and the foreign government to which the alien owes allegiance, is an binding agreement which may be enforced on the resumption of peace, and this is so though the goods were seized by the foreign government when hostilities were imminent and for the purpose of carrying on the war.

5. Fire insurance—Arbitration—English contract—Conditions — Law of Jersey.—A fire policy was issued by an English company in favour of a Jersey gentleman upon property in Jersey. It was in English, and executed in Jersey by the agents of the insurance company. Among the conditions indorsed on the policy it was provided that no action should be brought for any money payable under the policy until the liability and the amount had been fixed by arbitration, and also that the submission to arbitrators should be subject to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and might be made a rule of the High Court of Justice.

Held, that this was an English contract, and ought to be governed by English law; that, consequently, no action could be sustained in Jersey or in this country for any money payable under the policy unless and until the amount so payable had been settled by arbitration pursuant to the conditions.—SPURRIER v. LA CLOCHE, P.C., 1; [1902] A. C. 446; 71 L. J. P. C. 101; 86 L. T. 631.

6. Life—Illegality—Insurable interest—Action to recover premiums paid—Insurance law, knowledge of.—The fact that a person will at some future date be under a moral, though not a legal, obligation to pay for the funeral expenses of a relative is not sufficient to create an insurable interest in that relative's life.

The agent of the defendants, an insurance company, in good faith and believing his statement to be true, represented to the plaintiff that an insurance effected by the plaintiff upon the life of his mother would be a good and valid insurance, and the plaintiff, relying upon that representation, effected an insurance with the defendants on his mother's life, and paid premiums thereunder. The policy being illegal and void for want of an insurable interest,

Held, that, as the plaintiff was entitled to assume that the defendants' agent would have a knowledge of insurance law, the parties were not in pari delicto, and the premiums could consequently be recovered back.—HARSE v. PEARL LIFE ASSURANCE CO., K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. B. 92; 72 L. J. K. B. 638

7. Life—Industrial assurance company—Policy—No insurable interest—Premiums paid under void policy—Claim for return of premiums—Jurisdiction of justices—Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 26), s. 7—Life Assurance Act, 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48), s. 1—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18.—Section 7 of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, provides that in all disputes between an industrial assurance company and any member or person insured that member or person may apply to the court of summary jurisdiction for the place where that member or person resides, and the court may settle the dispute.

Held, that the section applies only the settling of disputes between the assurance company and its members, or persons insured, or under the rules of the society; and that, consequently, where a person, who has effected an insurance with an industrial assurance company on the life of another person, afterwards claims the return of premiums paid under the policy, on the ground that the insurance never was a valid insurance, and the policy was void for want of insurable interest, the section does not apply, and the court of summary jurisdiction has no jurisdiction to determine such claim, as the claimant's case then is that he never was insured with the company at all, and, therefore, he is estopped from saying that he is a "person insured."

In such case the objection that there is no jurisdiction in the justices can be taken before the Divisional Court, although such objection was not taken or raised before the justices, and no question as to it is left to the court by the justices; but the party so taking the objection may have to pay the costs thrown away by not taking the objection at the proper time.—LONDON, EDINBURGH, AND GLASGOW ASSURANCE CO. v. PARTINGTON, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 732.

8. Life—Payment into court—Opinion of directors—Reasonable ground for opinion—Costs—Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 8), s. 3—Ord. 54c, rr. 3, 5, 7.—A life assurance company, against whom an action has been brought on a policy, are entitled to an order under ord. 54c, r. 3, giving them leave to pay the insurance money into court, under section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies (Payment into Court) Act, 1896, if it is shown that in the opinion of the board of directors no sufficient discharge can otherwise be obtained. It is not necessary to show that the directors have reasonable grounds for being of that opinion.

Any prejudice to the claimant by reason of the directors having acted unreasonably in the matter may be remedied by an order as to costs on the subsequent application for taking the money out of court.—HARRISON v. ALLIANCE ASSURANCE CO., C.A., 281; [1903] 1 K. 9. Life—Premium, payment of—Premium payable by quarterly instalments—Instalment becoming due during currency of policy—Payment during days of grace after death of assured—Liability on policy.—The premium on an annual policy of life insurance was payable by quarterly instalments on certain specified days or within thirty days after. One of the conditions in the policy provided that in case a claim should arise during the subsistence of the policy and before all the premiums, whether half-yearly or quarterly, for the then current year should have become due and been paid, the amount of such premiums should be deducted from the sum assured; and the policy should become void if at the time of the death of the assured any of the above-mentioned premiums were more than thirty days in arrear. The assured, having assigned the policy, died after the day on which one of the quarterly instalments for the current year became due, but before the expiration of the thirty days of grace, without having paid the instalment. The assignee, after the death of the assured, paid the instalment within the thirty days, both he and the insurers being unaware of the death of the assured. In an action on the policy by the assignee against the insurers to recover the amount of the policy moneys,

Held, that as the insurance was for a year, subject to a condition for forfeiture if any of the quarterly instalments were not paid within thirty days after they became due, the payment of the instalment within the thirty days of grace during the subsistence of the policy, though after the death of the assured, was a valid payment, and the assignee was entitled to recover.

10. Marine—Concealment of facts—Knowledge of Lloyd's agent—Knowledge of individual member of Lloyd's.—The knowledge of Lloyd's agents cannot be taken to be the knowledge of an individual member of Lloyd's, so as to make void a policy of marine insurance on the ground of concealment of facts, where such individual member has no actual knowledge in fact. — WILSON v. SALAMANDRA ASSURANCE CO., K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 96.

11. Marine—Custom at Lloyd's—Periodical settlement between broker and underwriter—Bankruptcy of broker — Liability of underwriter. — A policy of insurance was effected on a cargo of tea by an insurance broker on behalf of the plaintiff, and the defendant, a member of Lloyd's, subscribed the said policy. In accordance with a custom at Lloyd's, the broker and the defendant had a running account which was periodically settled, whereby premiums due to the defendant were set off as against losses due to the broker.

A loss under the said policy was thus settled in an account.

The broker, before paying the plaintiff the sum so due, became bankrupt, and the plaintiff sued the defendant.

Held, that the plaintiff was not bound by the custom, unless he knew of its existence, and that it lay on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff knew of the custom; and that Sweeting v. Pearce, 9 W. R. 343, was not affected by Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 24 W. R. Dig. 222.—MATVEIEFF & CO. v. CROSSFIELD, K.B.D., 365.

12. Marine—Loss—Constructive total loss—Taking value of wreck into account.—Where a vessel has been stranded by a peril insured against, in estimating whether or not she is a constructive total loss, the value of the wreck is not an element which ought to be taken into consideration.—ANGEL v. MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE CO., C.A., 530; [1903] 1 K. B. 811; 72 L. J. K. B. 498; 88 L. T. 717.

13. Marine — Policy — Duration of risk—Construction—"Thirty days in port after arrival."—A policy of marine insurance on a vessel was expressed to be four "a voyage from Portland, Oregon, by any route to Algoa Bay and for thirty days in port after arrival, however employed." The policy described the risk as running until the vessel "hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The words "twenty-four hours" were struck out and the words "as above" were written over them. The vessel arrived at Algoa Bay at 10 a.m. on the 2nd of August, 1902; was safely moored at anchor in the bay at 11.30 on the same day; and was totally lost at 4.30 p.m. on the 1st of September.

Held, that "thirty days" meant thirty consecutive periods of twenty-four hours, beginning at 11 30 a.m. on the 2nd of August, and not thirty calendar days, and that therefore the vessel was lost after the expiration of the time covered by the policy.—CORNFOOT v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION, K.B.D., 527; 72 L. J. K. B. 387.

14. Marine—Policy on hull and machinery of torpedo-boat, destroyer—"Latent defect"—"Breakage of shafts" — "Trials." — A policy of marine insurance upon the hull and machinery of a torpedo-boat destroyer covered the following perils: "Fire in shops and on board, on stocks, trials, and all marine risks to completion and acceptance by the Admiralty . . . and all other perils, losses, or misfortunes." Attached to the policy was this clause: "This insurance is also specially to cover loss of or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of mariners, engineers, or pilots, or through explosions, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or through any latent defect . . . with leave to go on trial trips." During a trial the connecting rod of the starboard engine broke, causing great damage.

Held, that "latent defect in machinery" did not cover a weakness in design; that the breakage of the connecting rod was not a "breakage of shafts": and that "trials" did not denote a period during which the assured were to be insured against fire, but specified a particular peril insured against—viz., peril of trials.—JACKSON v. MUMFORD, K.B.D., 91.

15. Marine—Reinsurance—Constructive total loss—"To pay as may be paid thereon"—Suing and labouring—Salvage charges.—Shipowners insured their ship with the plaintiffs for a voyage against partial as well as total loss, the sound value of the ship being expressed in the policy to be agreed at a specified sum. The plaintiffs reinsured with the defendant against the risk of total or constructive total loss only, the ship being valued at per original policy. The policy of reinsurance was in the form of an ordinary Lloyd's policy, containing in print the usual undertaking by the assurers to contribute to suing and labouring charges. It also contained in writing the following clauses: "Being a reinsurance subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy and to pay as may be paid thereon"; and, "No claim to attach to this policy for salvage charges." During the course of the insured voyage the ship stranded and suffered damage. The probable cost of getting her afloat, taking her to a port of repair, and repairing her exceeded the agreed value of the ship as expressed in the policy, but as it was in fact less than her real repaired value, the owners elected not to give notice of abandonment. The ship was floated and placed in a condition of safety, and subsequently taken to a port of repair and repaired. The owners recovered from the plaintiffs upon their policy £107 per cent. of their proportion of the agreed value of the ship, that sum being made up partly of the expense of repairs and partly of the expense of floating. The plaintiffs then sued the defendant for the full amount underwritten by him as in respect of a constructive total loss, or in the alternative for his proportion of the suing and labouring charges.

Held, (1) that, there being, in the absence of a notice of abandonment by the owners, no original liability upon the plaintiffs to pay as for a constructive total loss, the mere fact that they had paid, in respect of a partial loss and suing and labouring charges combined, upwards of £100 per cent. did not entitle the plaintiffs to recover that sum from the defendant as for a constructive total loss under the words "to pay as may be paid thereon"; and (2) that the clause providing that no claim was to attach for "salvage charges" excluded the defendant's obligation to contribute to the suing and labouring charges, notwithstanding the omission to delete the printed clause imposing that obligation.

16. Marine—"Restraints of people"—Prohibition against landing cattle—"Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention."—Under a Lloyd's policy cattle were insured for a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres against (inter alia) "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people." The policy also contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention." Prior to the shipment the Argentine Government had issued a decree prohibiting the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases, and providing for the slaughter of animals suspected of disease. On arrival at Buenos Ayres the cattle were found to be suffering from a contagious disease, and the authorities refused to allow them to be landed. The cattle were thereupon transhipped to another vessel outside the port and taken to another port, where they were sold at a considerable loss. In an action on the policy, Held, (1) not agreeing with the judgment of Bigham, J., that the loss was a loss within the words "restraints of people" in the policy; and (2), agreeing with Bigham, J., upon this point, that the warranty against capture, seizure, or detention freed the underwriters from liability under the words "arrests, restraints, and detainments" in the earlier part of the policy.

17. Marine—Ship—Valued policy—Salvage and general average contribution—Real value of ship—Liability of underwriters.—A ship was insured for £33,000 and was valued in the policy for the same sum. While the policy was current a general average loss was sustained and salvage services rendered to the ship, and the ship was valued in the salvage action at £40,000. In an action on the policy, Held, that the shipowners were only entitled to recover from the underwriters thirty-three-fortieths of the amount due from the ship for salvage and general average.

18. Marine—Subject-matter of insurance—Liability of shipowner under contract of carriage—Suing and labouring clause—Applicability.—A number of mules exceeding £20,000 in value having been shipped on the plaintiffs' steamship for carriage under a contract which contained no clause exempting the plaintiffs from liability for loss of the mules through the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants, the plaintiffs effected an insurance with the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyd's, to protect them against "liability of any kind" to the owners of the mules up to £20,000 owing to the omission of the negligence clause from the contract. The policy was in the printed form of an ordinary Lloyd's policy, containing the usual suing and labouring clause. During the voyage the vessel stranded through the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants, and expenses were incurred by the plaintiffs in saving some of the mules and in attempting to save others which were lost. The plaintiffs sought to recover these expenses, not as a direct loss under the policy, but under the suing and labouring clause as expenses incurred to avert or reduce the amount of the loss.

Held, that the suing and labouring clause was inapplicable to and formed no part of the contract of insurance, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover in the action.—CUNARD STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. MARTEN, K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 624; 71 L. J. K. B. 968; 87 L. T. 400.

19. Marine—Time policy—General average—Contract of affreightment—Foreign statement—Belgian law.—A policy of marine insurance contained the following clause: "General average payable according to foreign statement if so made up or York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with contract of affreightment.

Attached to the policy were the Institute Time Clauses, 1900, one of which provides: "General average and salvage charges payable according to foreign statement or per York-Antwerp Rules if in accordance with the contract of affreightment."

By a charter-party made between the shipowner and the charterer it was agreed that, "In case of average the same to be settled according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1900, excepting that jettison of deck cargo (and freight thereon) for the common safety shall be allowable as general average."

The average statement was made up at Antwerp, and included jettisoned deck cargo and freight thereon. The shipowner paid the ship's contribution to general average. Apart from express agreement in the contract of affreightment, the Belgian law would not recognize such jettisoned deck cargo and freight thereon as being the subject of a claim for general average.

Held, in an action by the shipowner to recover from the underwriters the amount of his contribution, that the underwriters were liable.—DE HART v. COMPANIA ANONIMA "SEGUROS AURORA," K.B.D., 318; [1903] 1 K. B. 109; 72 L. J. K. B. 64; 87 L. T. 716.

20. Marine—Voyage policy—Round voyage—Implied warranty of seaworthiness—Insufficiency of coal—Sacrifice of cargo and spars—Negligence clause—Breach of warranty covered by insurance.—Although the warranty of seaworthiness implied in a policy for a round voyage is that the ship is seaworthy for the whole voyage, the warranty, so far as the obligation of the shipowner to have on board a proper supply of coal is concerned, is sufficiently observed if the voyage is so arranged as that the vessel can and shall coal at convenient ports en route.

A policy of insurance for a round voyage contained the following clauses: "This insurance also to cover loss through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots. . . . Held covered in case of any breach of warranty . . . at a premium to be hereafter arranged."

The vessel started on one of the stages of the voyage with an insufficient supply of coal to carry her to the next coaling place, in consequence of which it became necessary to sacrifice part of the cargo, spars, and fittings.

Held, that the starting of the vessel on a stage of the voyage with an insufficient quantity of coal was a breach of the implied warranty of seaworthiness on the part of the shipowner.

Held, also, that the right of the shipowner, under one of the above clauses, to call upon the underwriter to hold him covered in case of a breach of warranty could only be exercised by him on payment of a reasonable additional premium, and that in the present case such premium would exceed the amount of any loss that could be claimed by the shipowner.

Held, further, that the shipowner was not entitled to recover under the negligence clause, because the loss was not due to any negligent act. —GREENOCK STEAMSHIP CO. v. MARITIME INSURANCE CO., K.B.D., 447; [1903] 1 K. B. 367; 72 L. J. K. B. 59; 88 L. T. 207.

In an action instituted in England by the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator against persons who had taken possession of the personal and real estate in the colony of the testator, all parties to the action being resident in England.

Held, that the English court had jurisdiction in the action to determine questions (1) as to the title to the real estate as well as the personalty situate in the colony, the two being so mixed together under the will that they could not be dealt with separately; and (2) as to whether a trust of the real estate had been created by the will or not.—CLINTON, RE, CLINTON v. CLINTON, *Ch.D. LANDLORD AND TENANT.

1. Agreement to let—Implied covenant for quiet enjoyment.—By a memorandum of agreement not under seal the landlord agreed to let and the tenant agreed to take a furnished house for a year.

Held, that, from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, there was an implied undertaking by the landlord for quiet enjoyment.

2. Contract of letting—Document not under seal—Weekly rent—Contract not to give notice to quit—Lease for life—Agreement for lease—Specific performance—Ejectment.—By a document not under seal it was expressed that the plaintiff had let a house to the defendant at a weekly rent, and that the plaintiff agreed not to raise the rent so long as the defendant lived in the house and paid rent regularly, and that the plaintiff would not give the defendant notice to quit, and that, if at any time the defendant wished to move out, the plaintiff promised to return to him the sum of money he had paid on taking possession.

In an action of ejectment brought after the defendant had refused to quit, in pursuance of a week's notice to quit,

Held, that the interest intended to be created by document was a lease to the defendant for his life subject to certain conditions; that though it would be void as such a lease for want of a seal, it might be used as an agreement for such a lease; and that such an agreement was capable of specific performance; and that, therefore, the defendant, electing to ask for specific performance, was entitled to judgment.—ZIMBLER v. ABRAHAMS, C.A., 343; [1903] 1 K. B. 577; 72 L. J. K. B. 103; 88 L. T. 46.

3. Covenant by lessee to pay present and future outgoings charged on the premises—Expenses of private street works—Works completed before commencement of term—Final apportionment made afterwards—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 6, 12, 13, 14.—A lease of certain premises contained a covenant by the lessee to "pay and bear all present and future rates, taxes, duties, assessments, and outgoings charged upon the said premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof." Before the commencement of the term certain private street works, executed under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, had been completed, and the expenses thereof became, from the date of completion a charge upon the premises, though the final apportionment of the expenses was not made until after the commencement of the term. The lessor, having paid the amount of the expenses apportioned in respect of the premises, sued the lessee to recover the sum so paid as being an outgoing which the lessee was liable to pay under his covenant.

Held, that the covenant did not apply to an outgoing which was charged upon the premises before the commencement of the term, though not payable until afterwards.—SURTEES v. WOODHOUSE, C.A., 275; [1903] 1 K. B. 396; 72 L. J. K. B. 302; 88 L. T. 407.

4. Covenant by lessor not to carry on or permit a particular trade on adjoining premises—Lessees—Assigns—Injunction.—The lessee of a person bound by a restrictive covenant can be sued, whether "assigns" are mentioned in the covenant or not.

In a lease by H. to the plaintiff company, the lessor covenanted that he, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, would not carry on, or permit to be carried on by others, in certain named shops the business of a tailor; H. subsequently demised one of the shops to B. for a tailoring business. In an action by the plaintiff company against H. and B. for an injunction to restrain H. from permitting, and B. from carrying on, this business.

Held, on the construction of the covenant, that the mention of assigns, without mentioning lessees, afforded no ground, standing alone, for holding that the covenant was not binding upon B.; that though "lessees" were not mentioned eo nomine, the words of the covenant were sufficient to bind B. not to carry on the particular business referred to, and that an injunction ought to be granted.

5. Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Assignment of reversion—Liability of assignee—Acts done on land acquired subsequently to demise from strangers to lessor—Breach of covenant—Interference with access of air to chimneys.—A covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease must be construed with reference to the state of things at the date of the covenant, and cannot be extended to cover user by the lessor of land acquired by him subsequently to the date of the lease, and even if it could be so extended the obligation would not be binding on an assignee of the reversion who has acquired adjoining land under another title, and does the Acts complained of under that other title.

Section 11 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, in no way alters the old law as to the class of covenants the burden of which will run with the reversion. A demise of offices to the plaintiff contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The lessor afterwards assigned the reversion on the term to the defendants. The defendants subsequently acquired the house next door to the demised offices, and having pulled it down rebuilt it much higher, thus causing the chimneys of the demised offices to smoke.

Held, that there was no breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

7. Covenant by lessee to pay all charges—Repair of defective drain by lessee by order of local authority—Liability of lessee to bear expense.—A lease for years, granted by the plaintiff to the defendant, contained a covenant by the lessee to pay during the term "the sewers rate and all other taxes, rates, charges, and assessments whatsoever, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which then were or thereafter should be imposed, charged, or assessed upon or in respect of the premises, or payable by either the owner or occupier in respect of the same." The lease also contained a covenant by the lessee to repair and keep in repair. In compliance with a notice given by the local authority, under section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the plaintiff did the work necessary to abate a nuisance caused by a defective drain upon the premises, and brought this action to recover the cost of that work.

Held, that the expenses of doing this work came within the terms of the covenant as a "charge imposed upon or in respect of the premises or payable by either the owner or occupier in respect of the same"; and that the lessee was therefore liable to pay the expense thereof himself.—GEORGE v. COATES, C.A.; 88 L. T. 48.

8 Covenant by tenant to pay "impositions"—Three years' tenancy—Notice by sanitary authority to reconstruct drains.—A landlord let a house to a tenant for three years at the clear yearly rent of £54 to be paid free and clear of and from all deductions. The tenant covenanted to pay all impositions which might become due or assessed in respect of the premises during the tenancy, property tax excepted.

Held, that the duty and expense of complying with a notice from the sanitary authority to reconstruct the drains constituted an imposition within the agreement which fell on the tenant.—WARRINER, RE, BRAYSHAW v NINNIS, Ch.D. Eady, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 367; 88 L. T. 766.

9. Covenant by lessee to pay taxes, rates, and assessments—Expenses of paving rate—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150.—A covenant in a lease that the lessee would during the continuance "pay all taxes, rates, and assessments imposed or assessed upon the premises or on the landlord or tenant in respect thereof," does not impose on the lessee the apportioned cost of paving the road in front of the premises in respect of work done by the local authority under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, where the work was done before, but the apportionment was made after, the granting of the lease.

10. Covenant not to assign without licence—Flat—"Not to be unreasonably or arbitrarily withheld"—Proviso in licence.—The lessee of a flat covenanted that he would not assign the flat without the licence in writing of the lessor, but such licence should not be unreasonably or arbitrarily withheld. On the lessee proposing to assign the flat to one J. H. H., a licence was granted to him by the lessor, but with the proviso "that this consent is granted upon the terms and conditions that if in consequence of the said assignment the rateable value of the said hereditaments and premises is increased you and the said J. H. H., or one of you, will on demand pay to the company (the lessor) any future increase of rates, taxes, charges, assessments, or impositions whatsoever assessed or imposed in consequence of the said assignment."

Declared, that the defendant company was not entitled to insert the proviso in the licence or any proviso to the like effect, and that the plaintiff might assign the flat to J. H. H. without any further consent from the defendant company.—YOUNG v. ASHLEY GARDENS PROPERTIES, C.A.; [1903] 2 Ch. 112; 72 L. J. Ch. 520; 88 L. T. 541.

11. Covenant not to do or suffer any act—Sub-lease—Breach by subtenant—Liability of assignee of lessee.—T. being the assignee of a lease which contained a covenant that the lessee would not do or suffer to be done on the premises any acts whereby the licence might be forfeited or indorsed, sub-leased to K., such sublease containing a covenant to the same effect.

K. committed a breach of the licensing laws and the justices refused to renew the licence.

In an action against T. by the lessor to recover damages for breach of the covenant, Held, that T. had not suffered the Act to be done, and was not liable.—WILSON v. TWAMLEY, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 803.

12. Covenant not to make alterations—Shop—Fixture—Advertising sign.—A tenant who occupied certain premises as a place of business under a lease, which contained a covenant by the lessee not to make any alteration to the premises without the consent of the landlord, erected on the front of the premises a clock some four feet in diameter and fastened into the stone of the front of the premises by iron bolts as an advertising sign without the consent of the landlord.

Held, that the covenant ought not to be so construed as to extend to any alteration which did not affect the structure or form of the premises, and at the same time was reasonable and proper for carrying on the business of the lessee in an ordinary way.—BICKMORE v. DIMMER, C.A., 180; [1903] 1 Ch. 153; 72 L. J. Ch. 96; 88 L. T. 78.

13. *Covenant to yield up fixtures—Construction—Trade fixtures—General words—Ejusdem generis—Right of tenant to remove trade fixtures.*—In a covenant by a tenant to deliver up fixtures at the end of his lease, if there is a series of words which point to additions to the premises which ordinarily would not as between landlord and tenant be removable by the tenant, general words which follow those particular words ought to be confined to things not included in tenant's fixtures, unless there is something which clearly shows an express intention that they are not to be so confined.

In order to show that the covenant for delivery up has taken away the tenant's rights, the onus is on the landlord to show that that was the object and intention of the covenant, and if the language of the covenant leaves the matter doubtful, the ordinary rights of the tenant will not be interfered with.

14. Covenant to pay—"Outgoings"—Tenancy for three years—Order by sanitary authority to reconstruct drain—Liability of tenant.—The plaintiff let a house to the defendant for a term of three years, the tenant agreeing to pay all "outgoings payable in respect of the premises." During the tenancy the plaintiff, in obedience to an order from the sanitary authority, reconstructed the drainage system of the house.

Held, that the shortness of the term was no reason for putting a more limited construction upon the expression "outgoings" than that which would have been put upon it in a lease for a longer period, and that the defendant was liable under his agreement to recoup the plaintiff the expense of the drainage work.

Decision of Farwell, J., in Valpy v. St. Leonards Wharf Co., [1903] 1 L. G. R. 305, distinguished.—STOCKDALE v. ASCHERBERG, K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. B. 873; 72 L. J. K. B. 492; 88 L. T. 767.

15. Forfeiture—Covenant not to assign or underlet without consent—Mortgage by sub-demise without consent—Issue of writ by lessor for recovery of possession—Distress by receiver of mortgagees on goods of tenant in possession after issue of writ—Action for wrongful distress—Payment of rent by tenant after issue of lessor's writ—Estoppel—Liability of solicitors of mortgagees.—A lease of land and buildings for thirty-five years, made in 1896, contained a covenant that the lessee would not assign or underlet without the consent in writing of the lessor, which was not to be unreasonably withheld if the proposed assignee or under-tenant should be a respectable and responsible person, and also contained a proviso for re-entry upon a breach of any of the covenants therein. An assignee of the lease, having let the premises to a tenant from year to year, and mortgaged the premises by sub-demise without the consent of the lessor, was adjudicated bankrupt. On the 18th of September, 1901, the lessor issued a writ for recovery of possession of the premises, without stating the ground of the claim. The tenant, while disclaiming any intention of defending the action, entered an appearance to it, and, in order to gain time, with the object of keeping possession of the premises, on the 15th of October paid the rent for the quarter ending the 29th of September to the receiver appointed by the mortgagees under the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The claim of the lessor was afterwards amended by alleging the breach of covenant by the mortgage without the consent of the lessor as the ground of forfeiture. On the 11th of January, 1902, the solicitors for the mortgagees having written to the receiver that they would be glad to hear that a distress had been put in, the receiver distrained upon the goods of the tenant on the premises for the rent due on the 25th of December, 1901. The tenant thereupon commenced an action for wrongful distress against the solicitors for the mortgagees and the receiver, at the hearing of which the jury returned a verdict for the tenant with damages. On the 20th of March, 1902, the lessor obtained judgment by consent in the action for recovery of possession.

Held, upon an application for a new trial of the action for wrongful distress—first, that the mortgage by sub-demise was a breach of the covenant not to assign or underlet without the consent of the lessor; secondly, that the issue by the lessor of the writ to recover possession and service thereof on the lessee determined the lease; thirdly, that, in the circumstances, the tenant was not estopped by the payment of rent after the service of the lessor's writ from asserting that the lease was determined; fourthly, that, in the circumstances, the tenant was entitled to recover damages against the solicitors for the mortgagees.—SERJEANT v. NASH, FIELD, & Co, C.A; [1903] 2 K. B. 304; 72 L. J. K. B. 630.

16. Power given to lessee to determine lease on notice—Lessor's remedies for antecedent breaches of covenant to repair not reserved—Liability of lessee.—By an indenture of lease for fourteen years it was provided that the lessees might, upon giving six months' previous notice in writing, determine the lease at the end of the first seven years, and that in such case the "indenture and every clause, matter, and thing" therein contained should upon the expiration of the notice "cease and determine and be void." The lease did not contain any proviso that the exercise by the lessees of their power to determine should be subject to the lessor's rights and remedies for existing breaches by the lessees of the covenants. The lessees duly determined the lease at the end of the seven years and left the premises out of repair.

Held, that the lessor was entitled to sue the lessees upon the covenant to repair contained in the lease, on their determining the lease under their above power, notwithstanding that no such right was expressly reserved.—BLORE v. GIULINI, K.B.D., 336; [1903] 1 K. B. 356; 72 L. J. K. B. 114; 88 L. T. 235.

17. Proviso for re-entry—Covenants "to be performed" by lessee—Default in "performance"—Negative covenant—Not to use premises for particular business without licence—Licence to predecessor in title—Breach.—A lease contained a covenant by the lessee not to use the premises for any business except that of an outfitter without the licence in writing of the lessor. It also contained a proviso for re-entry in case the lessee should "make default in the performance of any of the covenants upon his part to be performed." The original lessor gave to the original lessee licence in writing to use the premises for a business other than that of an outfitter. The successor in title of the original lessee used the premises otherwise than for the business of an outfitter. In an action of ejectment by the successor in title of the original lessor, Held, that the proviso for re-entry applied only to breaches of positive and not of negative covenants.

Semble, also, that there was no breach of covenant.—HARMAN v. AINSLIE, K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. B. 241; 72 L. J. K. B. 533; 88 L. T. 770.

18. Renewal of lease—"At the costs of the lessee"—Costs of arbitration to assess fine payable on renewal.—A lease contained a covenant by the lessor that he would at any time during the term "upon the request and at the cost of the lessee," and on payment of a fine calculated upon the number of years of the term which had expired and the full improved annual value of the premises at the time of the renewal (such value to be determined by the lessor's surveyor or at the option of the lessee by the award of two referees or their umpire), renew the term. The lessee required the lessor to renew the term, and gave notice of his desire to have the full improved annual value of the premises determined by the award of two referees or their umpire.

Held, that the costs of the reference must be paid by the lessee.

Judgment of Wright, J. ([1902] 1 K. B. 512, 50 W. R. Dig. 92), reversed.—MOSTYN (LORD) AND FITZSIMMONS, RE, C.A., 257; [1903] 1 K. B. 349; 72 L. J. K. B. 164; 88 L. T. 7.

19. Residential flats—Express covenant for quiet enjoyment—General scheme—Implied obligation—Nuisance arising from acts of tenants in adjoining flats.—The plaintiff was the tenant of a flat under an agreement with C. which contained the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment. The adjoining flats in the same building were held by other tenants under similar agreements, in all of which there was a stipulation by the tenant that he would not permit the premises to be used for any unlawful or immoral purpose, but, on the contrary, would as much as possible contribute to the respectability of the building and keep the premises as a private dwelling-house or residential chambers. C. contracted to sell the building, but no actual assignment of the lease had been executed, when the plaintiff brought an action against the ultimate purchasers, as the equitable assignees of the reversion, on the ground that the flat adjoining his own was being used for immoral purposes. He complained that a nuisance was thereby created and damage sustained by him; and he claimed a declaration that the defendants were bound by the covenant for quiet enjoyment, and an injunction to restrain them from permitting the adjoining flat to be used so as to interfere with the quiet enjoyment by the plaintiff of his flat; and from permitting any act inconsistent with the terms of the agreement. The defendants counter-claimed for arrears of rent, and submitted that no cause of action against them was disclosed. The points of law were first argued. It was decided by Buckley, J., that the covenant for quiet enjoyment related only to freedom from disturbance by adverse claimants extending to physical interference with the use by the plaintiff of his flat as distinguished from its comfortable enjoyment; that the case must go on to trial on this point; that the defendants were not liable for the acts of persons acting adversely to them; but that it might be shown at the hearing that such acts were impliedly authorized by continued receipt of rent from the offending tenant; and, further, that the plaintiff could rely on there being a general scheme for the use of the flats. The defendants appealed.

Held, that, on the grounds stated by Buckley, J., it was impossible at the present stage of the proceedings for the court to say that there might not be a cause of action capable of proof; that whether that was so or not must depend upon what took place at the trial of the action; and that therefore the case must go to trial.—JAEGER v. MANSIONS CONSOLIDATED (LIMITED). C.A.; 87 L. 20. Weekly tenancy—Notice to quit.—By an agreement for a weekly tenancy it was agreed that the tenancy might be terminated by either landlord or tenant giving the other one week's notice, the key to be given up before twelve o'clock on the day of leaving.

Held, that a notice given at 10 a.m. on the 17th of November to expire on the 24th of November was not a good notice. A week's notice is seven clear days, and the law does not take notice of the fraction of a day.—WESTON v. FIDLER K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 769.

LANDS CLAUSES ACT:—

1. Acquisition of land—Boundary defined by "proposed road"—Description not grant of easement.—Where a proposed road is mentioned in the particulars scheduled to a notice to treat for the compulsory purchase of land—e.g., as the site for a board school—as one of the boundaries of such land, the same must be regarded as descriptive merely, and not as passing any right to have the road constructed, or any right over land adjacent to the land so compulsorily acquired. A school board gave notice to F., the owner of certain property which he contemplated developing as a building estate, to treat for the purchase of part thereof as the site for a school. In the particulars scheduled to the notice the land required was described as land with frontages to A.-road, B.-road, "and a proposed road leading therefrom." At the inquisition to determine the purchase-money and compensation a verdict was taken by consent for £8 000 "for the purchase of the estate and interest of F. in the land and hereditaments" in the warrant for the summoning of the jury mentioned; "also by way of compensation, for all damage sustained by severance or otherwise by reason of the exercise of the powers of" the school board. In the warrant the land was described by reference to the schedule to the notice to treat which was set out in the warrant. Subsequently to the inquisition F. informed the school board that it was not intended to form the proposed road shown on the scheduled plan, and suggested a modification of the boundary, his reason being that the road was part of his original scheme for developing his property as a building estate, but that under the altered circumstances it would not be worth his while to construct the road. A summons, under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, was taken out by the school board asking for a declaration that they were entitled to a conveyance of the piece of land specified in their notice to treat with frontages to A.-road, B.-road, and a proposed road leading therefrom and shown on the plan to such notice according to the draft conveyance submitted to F.

Held, that the school board had not obtained any right over F.'s land adjacent to the site which they had purchased; that they had no right to acquire an easement over adjacent land under their compulsory powers, which did not extend to the compulsory acquisition of easements, but only the right to acquire the land itself; that the reference in the notice to treat to the proposed road was merely descriptive; and that the proposed road could not be regarded as an actually made road.—SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON AND FOSTER, RE. C.A.; 87 L. T. 700.

2. Compensation—Free and exclusive right to supply refreshments &c.—Estate and interest—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.—An agreement which grants and lets the free and exclusive right to sell refreshments in a theatre, together with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms, bars, and cellars, and the right of free access to and from all parts of the premises as might be necessary, and of supplying and providing programmes, &c., and cloak-rooms and other accommodation, and also the sole and exclusive privilege of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements in the refreshment and cloak-rooms and on all the programmes does not create an estate or interest within section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.—WARR & Co. v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 689.

3. Compensation—Offer by promoters of undertaking—Time for acceptance—Acceptance at hearing before jury.—An offer of a sum of money by the promoters of an undertaking under section 38 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, may be accepted by the owner of the lands sought to be purchased at any time before the verdict of the jury is given assessing the amount of the compensation.—REX v. WESTMINSTER HIGH BAILIFF. K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. B. 189; 72 L. J. K. B. 600; 88 L. T. 834.

4. Compulsory purchase—Personal inconvenience to limited owner—Compensation—Lands Clauses Act. 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 73.—A limited owner of lands taken by compulsory purchase under the Lands Clauses Acts is entitled to have any personal inconvenience which may be caused to him by the works for which the land is taken considered in the fixing of the purchase price, and to have so much of the purchase price as is attributable to such consideration paid to him.—SAUNDERTON GLEBE LANDS, RE. Ch D. Farwell, J., 522; [1903] 1 Ch. 480; 72 L. J. Ch. 276; 88 L. T. 267.

5. Injurious affection—Taking lands—Notice to treat—Lease of adjoining land subsequently to service of notice—Right of lessee to compensation for injurious affection—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 18, 68.—Where a notice to treat for land has been given under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, compensation must be assessed once for all under the notice both in respect of the land taken and also under section 68 for the injurious affection of other land belonging to the same owner, and the owner cannot, after the notice to treat and before the assessment of the compensation, grant a lease of or sell the land adjoining the land taken so as to confer upon the lessee or purchaser a right to claim compensation for the injurious affection of the land so leased or sold by the execution of the works.

Therefore, where, after the service of a notice to treat for land, and before the compensation had been assessed, the owner granted a lease of the adjoining land, and subsequently a sum was agreed upon between the owner and the undertakers as to the compensation payable to the owner under the notice to treat, the lessee is not entitled to compensation for the injurious affection of the demised land.

6. Railway—Reservation of minerals—Conveyance of surface — Costs — Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 19), ss. 117, 119. —The appellants purchased the rights of a feuar, in whose feu contract the minerals were reserved by the superior, the respondents' predecessor. In 1892 a controversy arose between the appellants and the respondents as to the position of the appellants in respect to their dealings with minerals both above and below the authorized formation of level of the appellants' line. In 1894 the Court of Session decided that the respondents were entitled to the minerals below the authorized formation, and reserved to the respondents any claim they might have for the value of the minerals in the said lands above the authorized level of the railway to be determined by arbitration in terms of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, s. 117. In 1896 the respondents applied for compensation for the minerals above the surface. the appellants denied that they were under any liability for compensation, claiming to have purchased the minerals in their conveyance from the feuar of the surface, and that it was within their right to remove them. The respondents then commenced this action, contending that the appellants stood now to be treated as trespassers, it being too late for them to rely on section 117 of the Act of 1845, they not having lodged a notice to treat within six months from the decision in 1894. The appellants contended that if they were wrong in their claim of ownership, they were still entitled to pay for the minerals by way of compensation, and not by damages, the six months given by the said Act not yet having commenced to run, as they had all along disputed the respondents' right.

Held, reversing the decision of the Court of Session ((1899) 37 S. L. R. 150, 406), that there had been no final determination, within the language of the section, of the respondents' right, and that, although this House now held their claim good, yet the appellants were not trespassers, and were entitled to the minerals upon payment of compensation.

Held, also, that the claimants (the respondents) were the proper parties to initiate a claim which it would have been possible for the appellants to satisfy.—CALEDONIAN RAILWAY CO. v. DAVIDSON, H.L.; [1903] A. C. 22; 72 L. J. P. C. 25; 87 L. T. 602.

7. Railway—Taking of land—Easement under church—Injuriously affecting church—Basis of compensation.—By a private Act, incorporating the Lands Clauses Act, a railway company was authorized to take the site of a church in London. Subsequently the company promoted a Bill for an extension of time for the construction of the railway and purchase of lands. This Bill was opposed, and upon the second reading a resolution was carried instructing the committee "to consider whether any and what provisions can reasonably be made for the preservation of the church of . . . without preventing the construction of the railway and station." Clauses were accordingly inserted providing that, notwithstanding anything contained in the previous Act, the company should not purchase or take any part of the church, but might take an easement or right of using the subsoil under any part of the property, including the crypt and foundations of the church; that the company should at all times make good any damage to the church caused by the railway or works; and that the compensation "for the subsoil and crypt," &c., should be assessed by an arbitrator. The company took the subsoil and crypt, and constructed a station under the church.

Held, that the compensation payable by the company was properly assessed upon the basis that the site of the church might at some future time, under the Union of Benefices Act, 1860, become available as building land, and had been injuriously affected as building land by the construction of the railway.—CITY AND SOUTH LONDON RAILWAY v ST. LIBEL:—

Fair comment — Criticism on literary work — Province of jury.—Where the defence of fair comment is set up in an action for libel in respect of a criticism on a literary work, the jury ought not to be left to make their own opinion of the literary merits of the work the test of fairness or unfairness. Unless there is in the criticism some element which may support an inference of unfairness in some other sense, such as an attack on the personal character of the plaintiff or an imputation that the plaintiff has written something which he has not in fact written, it is the duty of the judge to withdraw the case from the jury and to hold that there is no libel.—MCQUIRE v. WESTERN MORNING NEWS CO., C.A., 689; [1903] 2 K. B. 100; 72 L. J. K. B. 612; 88 L. T. 757.

LICENSING LAW:—

1. Offence—Sale at place not authorized by licence—Unlicensed restaurant—Wine sent out for—Proprietor of restaurant part proprietor of licensed wine shop from which waiter fetched the wine—Appropriation of goods—Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Act, 1868 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 27), s. 19.—The appellant was proprietor of a restaurant which was not licensed for the sale of wine and part proprietor of a duly licensed wine shop a few doors off.

Held, that although the waiter received money from the customer before he fetched a bottle of wine from the wine shop, yet that there was some evidence upon which the magistrate was justified in finding as a fact that there was a sale by the appellant of the wine to the customer, and therefore the conviction of the appellant for having sold wine on unlicensed premises must stand.—PASQUIER v. NEALE, K.B.D., 92; [1902] 2 K. B. 287; 71 L. J. K. B. 835; 87 L. T. 230.

2. Renewal—Control of justices over structure of licensed premises—"Part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold"—Passage giving second entrance to bar—Jurisdiction to order passage to be closed—Licensing Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 11, sub-section 4.—Held, that the power conferred on licensing justices by section 11 of the Licensing Act, 1902, to refuse to renew a licence unless "such alterations as they think reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the premises shall be made in that part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed" applied to any part of the licensed premises to which customers had access.

Therefore an order closing a passage which led to the bars and formed a second entrance to the licensed premises, the evidence being that although no liquor was sold or consumed at the back entrance or in the passage, it was frequently used by customers entering and leaving the premises, was one that the justices had jurisdiction to make.—BUSHELL v. HAMMOND, K.B.D., 695.

3. Renewal of licence—Objection taken by justices—Adjudication by justices raising the objection—Inquiries made by justices before hearing—Bias—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42—

Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.—An objection to the renewal of a licence may, under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, be made by licensing justices.

Licensing justices, having had their attention called by the county licensing committee to the large number of licensed houses in their district, appointed a committee to make inquiries and to report upon the matter. The committee collected statistics and inspected the licensed houses in the district and made a report, which was adopted at a meeting of the justices. At the general annual licensing meeting the chairman of the justices, on behalf of the justices, objected to the renewal of all the licences in the district, stating that the reason why the justices thus raised objection to the renewals was that every one of the licensees might bring evidence before them, and that they would thus be enabled to decide the cases with fairness and justice. The objections were accordingly adjourned, and the clerk to the justices, by their direction, served notice of objection, stating the grounds, upon each licensee requiring him to attend at the adjourned meeting. At the adjourned meeting the justices heard evidence on oath and refused the renewal of nine licences. Upon an application for a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine the applications for the renewal of the licences according to law, the chairman of the justices stated upon affidavit that the justices, in raising the objection, had not arrived at any decision whether or not to renew any of the licences, but had merely taken steps to put matters into proper train for fully considering each case on its merits, and that in deciding to refuse the renewals they had acted solely upon the evidence given upon oath in court.

Held, that, in the circumstances, the justices were not disqualified from sitting and deciding upon the applications for the renewal of licences.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (50 W. R. 573) affirmed.—REX v. HOWARD, C.A., 21; [1902] 2 K. B. 363; 71 L. J. K. B. 754; 86 L. T. 839.

4. Renewal—Transfer—Change of occupancy—Application by new occupier—Removal after expiration of licence—"Person so licensed"—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 14.—At a general annual licensing meeting H., who was the tenant of a beerhouse and holder of a licence to sell by retail beer to be consumed on the premises, applied for a renewal licence. The application having been refused, H. gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions. H. remained in possession of the house till the appeal could be heard, and in the meantime the licence expired. The appeal was dismissed, and then H. removed from the house. A few days later R. became tenant and went into possession.

Held, that, as H. was not a licensed person at the time when he removed from the house, R. was not entitled to apply for a licence under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828.

Simpkin v. Justices of Birmingham, 20 W. R. 702, L. R. 7 Q. B. 482, affirmed.—REX v. LONDON JUSTICES, C.A., 629; [1903] 2 K. B. 19; 72 L. J. K. B. 647; 88 L. T. 673.

5. Renewal of licence—Value of licensed premises—Break in continuity of licence—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) s. 45.—Section 45 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which requires premises to be of a certain annual value as a qualification for being licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon, does not apply to premises which were licensed at the time of the passing of the Act, and in respect of which the licence has been continuously renewed from that time. But where there has been a break in the continuity of the licence by the renewal having been refused since the passing of the Licensing Act, 1872, the annual value required by section 45 applies.

6. Sale of liquor to children—Corking and sealing of vessel—Bottle with screw stopper and label—No evidence that label could be removed without destruction—Sufficiency of label as a "sealing"—Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901 (1 Ed. 7, c. 27), s. 2.—The appellant sold to a child under the age of fourteen years, for consumption off the premises, a pint of beer in a bottle corked by means of a screw stopper and having an adhesive paper label fastened to the top of the stopper and to the sides of the neck of the bottle. Upon an information under section 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, the magistrate was of opinion that the label could be removed in several ways without destruction, as by steam or by a penknife, and the stopper withdrawn and the label afterwards refastened to the bottle, and he held that the bottle was not "sealed" in compliance with the section, and convicted the appellant. There was no evidence that the stopper had been removed or could be removed without destroying the label.

Held, that there was no evidence before the magistrate on which he could properly find that the label could be removed without destruction or that the bottle was not "sealed" in compliance with the section, and that the conviction therefore could not be supported.—MACEY v. MCKENZIE, K.B.D.; 88 L. 7. Sale of liquors to children—Knowingly allowing a person to sell—Sale by barman—Knowledge of licence-holder.—The holder of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, who has not delegated the charge or control of the licensed house or of the business carried on therein, is not liable under section 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act, 1901, for the act of his servant who, without his knowledge or connivance, sells to a child under the age of fourteen years intoxicating liquor in a bottle which is neither corked nor sealed.—EMARY v. NOLLOTH, K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. LIMITATIONS, STATUTE of:—

1. Acknowledgment—Promise to pay—Promise to pay sum found due on accounts taken—21 Jac. 1, c. 16.—The defendant, whose debt of £100 to the plaintiff, his uncle, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, wrote to the plaintiff's wife within six years before action a letter in which he said that he was sorry at not having been able to pay it off long ago, that he was unable to satisfy himself as to the exact amount owing, but that he had some note of what he had paid back, and asking for particulars, adding that he would do his best to pay back what he owed. The plaintiff's wife having replied that the plaintiff denied that anything had been paid off, the defendant wrote to her as follows: "I must say your letter was a great surprise to me. I was well aware that I did give uncle £100 originally, but subsequently I gave him a cheque for £40, because I kept the stub of the cheque, and I am almost positive I gave him another cheque for £20, reducing the amount at the time I left him to £40. How it is uncle did not credit me with it, I cannot think; but if he hunts up his old bank books he will be able to trace up the amounts, and I feel sure he will be satisfied that I am correct. Anyway I hope so. Just at present I cannot lay my hand upon my bank book of that date, or would be more positive on the subject. At present I have no money on hand, having bought some houses out of the portion I got, but as soon as there is another division I will send uncle some. In the meantime I hope you will hunt up the required information." Since that letter "another division" (i.e., of property under a will) had taken place. In an action to recover the £100 and interest, the judge found that no part of the £100 had been repaid.

Held, that the letter, though not an acknowledgment of the debt of £100, contained a promise to pay the amount which might be found due from the defendant upon the accounts being taken, and that therefore the Statute of Limitations was no bar to the action.—LANGRISH v. WATTS, C.A., 503; [1903] 1 K. 4. Recovery of land—Surrender of lease—Merger—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 2.—A tenant cannot by the surrender of his lease convey to his landlord any better title than he could grant to a third person by assignment or underlease.

In 1837 A. granted a lease of three lives to B. In 1885 B. surrendered his lease to A. The last of the three lives dropped in 1895. In an action by A. against C., a trespasser, who had by himself or his predecessors been in possession for more than thirty years, Held, that the Statute of Limitations began to run as against the landlord in 1895 and not 1885.

Held, further, that a lease for years was not "a particular estate on which any future estate or interest was expectant" within the meaning of section 2 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that, therefore, the period fixed by the Act was twelve years and not six.—WALTER v. YALDEN, K.B D., 46; [1902] 2 K. 1. Buildings—Erection of premises in advance of building line—Plans submitted to urban authority—Approval of plans—Written consent — Action by private individual — Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.—By the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, s. 3, it is not lawful, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof, and any person offending is liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice in this behalf from the urban authority. The defendant prepared plans which showed that the buildings he intended to erect would be brought forward beyond the front main line, and these plans were produced before, and passed by, the urban authority. The plaintiff, who was the owner of the adjoining premises, alleged special damage, and claimed a mandatory injunction.

Held (1) that the plaintiff as a private individual had no right of action under the above section; and (2) that the resolution of the urban authority approving the plans constituted "written consent" within the meaning of the said section.—MULLIS v. HUBBARD, *Ch.D. The district surveyors are officers under the London Building Act, 1894. They are therefore entitled, under section 145 of that Act, to receive notices of structures falling within section 84, and, in a proper case, are entitled to inspect and receive a fee for such inspection.—WESTMINSTER CITY COUNCIL v. WATSON, K.B.D., 300; [1902] 2 K. 3. Bye-laws — Infringement — Urban authority—Erection of houses abutting on public highway—Laying out new street—Injunction—Special remedy—Proceedings before justices—Right of corporation to sue — Attorney-General's fiat — Jurisdiction. — The defendants were the owners of a triangular piece of land within the plaintiffs' borough. Two sides of the triangle abutted upon public highways within the borough. The defendants, in pursuance of a building scheme, erected houses on their land fronting the highways. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants were laying out the highways as new streets which did not comply with the requirements of the borough bye-laws as to width, and they claimed, first, an injunction, and, secondly, a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to remove or pull down any work begun or done by the defendants in contravention of the bye-laws. The bye-laws, which were framed under the Public Health Act, 1875, prescribed a penalty for infringement, to be recovered by summary proceedings, and provided that the plaintiffs might, subject to any statutory provision in that behalf, remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of the bye-laws.

Joyce, J., held that the defendants were not laying out or intending to lay out the highways as new streets within the meaning of the bye-laws; (2) that the bye-laws could not be enforced by action for an injunction, but only by the special remedies thereby provided, or by way of information by the Attorney-General; and (3) that no such declaration as asked for ought to be made.

The court dismissed the appeal on the ground that the plaintiffs could not enforce the bye-laws by such an action without the intervention of the Attorney-General. The court also stated that they agreed with the decision of Joyce, J., that the defendants were not laying out a new street.—DEVONPORT CORPORATION v. TOZER, C.A.; [1903] 1 Ch. 759; 72 L. J. The district council had no power to dispense with the bye-law in exceptional cases.

5. Conversion of part of rural district into urban district—Adjustment of property and liabilities—"Property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses"—Highway expenses—Loss of income to rural district—Local Government Acts, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 57, 62; and 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 54.—By an order made under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, part of a rural district was converted into an urban district, and the property and liabilities of the rural district council, so far as regarded the area comprised in the new urban district, became vested in the urban district council, including the liability to maintain the highways. The rural district council claimed an adjustment of the income, liabilities, and expenses, under section 62 of the Act, in respect of the maintenance of the highways, upon the ground that the contributions formerly received by the rural district council from the area comprised in the new urban district exceeded the cost of the maintenance of the highways in that district, and that therefore there would be a loss of income to them by reason of the order.

Held, that this loss of income was a matter for adjustment under the words "property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses" in section 62 of the Act.

Section 54 of the Local Government Act, 1894, does not apply to such a case.—GODSTONE RURAL COUNCIL AND CATERHAM URBAN COUNCIL, RE, C.A., 353; [1903] 1 K. B. 554; 72 L. J. K. B. 279; 88 L. T. 414.

A hoarding upon a disused churchyard managed under the Metropolitan Open Spaces Acts, 1877, 1881, and 1887, and the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, erected for the purpose of preventing an adjoining landowner from acquiring by prescription a right to access of light to windows of his houses overlooking the churchyard, is not a building within the meaning of those Acts, and its erection is therefore not prohibited by them.—BOYCE v. PADDINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL, *Ch.D. Held, that section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, did not impose any fresh liability upon promoters of the undertakings under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that the defendants as promoters of an undertaking were only liable to make good the deficiency in that proportion of the general rate, which represented the poor rate.—ISLINGTON CORPORATION v. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD, K.B.D. 255; [1902] 2 K. 11. Provisional order—Sewer accommodation—Provision by owners—Appeal—Expenses of alterations—Justices to make such order "as to them may seem equitable."—By the Bootle Provisional Order, 1897, when a sewer and water supply sufficient for the purpose were reasonably available, the appellants could, by written notice to the owner of any building, require any existing closet accommodation provided at or in connection with the building to be altered so as to be converted into a water-closet complying with the bye-laws in force and communicating with the sewer. If the owner failed to comply with the notice the appellants could do the work specified in the notice and recover the expenses from the owner. If any person deemed himself aggrieved by any of the requirements of the appellants, or as to the reasonableness of any expenses wholly or partially recoverable from him, he could appeal to the justices and they might make such order in the matter as to them might seem equitable. The respondent, the owner of certain houses, was served with a notice requiring him to alter the closet accommodation into water-closets. On an appeal to justices they held that the requirements of the corporation as to the alterations in the closet accommodation were reasonable, and they ordered him to comply with the notice. They further ordered that the expense of doing the work should be borne in equal shares by the appellants and the respondent.

Held, that the justices had power to make any order as to the expenses that appeared to them reasonable.—CORPORATION OF BOOTLE v. OWENS, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 74.

The section in no way considers the title of the original owner of the soil, and the rights of the local authority under the section are neither increased nor diminished according to the extent of such original ownership. Nor are the rights of the local authority increased by the fact that it is impossible to point to any actual owner. Thus where the ownership in fee simple in the soil of a road was originally acquired by turnpike trustees under 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, and the road subsequently became vested in an urban authority,

Held, that all that vested in the urban authority was so much as was necessary for the purposes of the user of the road by the public as a highway.

Subsequently the local authority proposed to execute private street works in the street under a different scheme.

Held, upon objection taken by the owners by premises in the street, that the matter was res judicata, by reason of the former determination of the justices.

14. Street—Private street works—Final apportionment of expenses amongst frontagers—Right of frontager to object to apportionment—When to be made—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), s. 12.—The respondents, an urban authority, acting in pursuance of section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, which Act had been adopted by them, employed a contractor to execute levelling, paving, channelling, metalling, and other works in a certain road which was a street within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875. Specifications, plans, and an estimate were duly made and deposited. The work was carried out, and on a final report by their surveyor that it had been satisfactorily completed the respondents paid to the contractor the contract price. The surveyor to the respondents then duly made a final apportionment of the expenses, and served notices of such apportionment upon the owners of premises affected thereby, in accordance with section 12 of the above Private Street Works Act. By sub-section 1 of that section it is provided that such final apportionment shall be conclusive for all purposes, and the sums thereby apportioned shall be recoverable in manner provided by the Act. Sub-section 2 of section 12 provides that within one month after notice of such final apportionment has been served, the owner of any premises charged with any expenses under such apportionment may object thereto upon the grounds, or any of them (inter alia), that the apportionment has not been made in accordance with the section, and that there has been an unreasonable departure from the specifications, plans, and sections.

The appellant, one of the frontagers affected by the notice of the final apportionment, objected thereto after one month had expired. The respondents took summary proceedings against the appellant to obtain payment of the sum apportioned upon him, and at the hearing before the justices the appellant objected that the works had not been completed within the meaning of section 12, because they had not been carried out in compliance with the specification, and that, therefore, the surveyor had no power to make a final apportionment of the expenses. He further desired to call evidence in support of his contention that the works had not been properly completed, but the justices refused to allow him to do so and ordered him to pay the sum claimed, on the ground that the final apportionment not having been objected to in manner provided by the Act was conclusive against him, and they therefore could not entertain the objection.

Held, that the decision of the justices was right.—HAYLES v. SANDOWN URBAN COUNCIL, K.B.D., 348; [1903] 1 K. B. 169; 72 L. J. K. B 48; 88 L. T. 61.

For the purpose of applying section 11 of Jervis's Act (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848) to the aforesaid circumstances, the matter of the complaint or information arises at the date of the demand of the sum due, and therefore the summons under section 256 the Public Health Act, 1875, may be taken out within six months from that date.

18. Water supply—Water rate—Extension of boundaries of borough—Right of corporation to differentiate the water rate—"Rates" in added part not to exceed a specified sum—Whether water rates are included as "rates."—A corporation, under a Waterworks Act, were entitled to charge for the supply of water for domestic use to any dwelling-house a sum not exceeding 7½ per cent. on the net rateable value, and they were also empowered, if there were a deficiency in the amount of the water account for any year, to make up the deficiency out of the general district rate. The corporation, whose boundaries were extended by an extension order, had been charging a uniform water rate of 7½ per cent. over the whole borough, but for certain reasons they reduced it in the old borough to 5 per cent., while retaining it in the added part at 7½ per cent.

Held, that the corporation had no power so to differentiate the water rate, but must charge the same water rate over the whole borough. An article of the extension order provided that the general district rates to be levied in the added part should not in any one year for a number of years exceed such an amount in the pound as when added to the poor rate and to the borough rate "and any other rate made by the corporation" in the same year would make up a certain specified total on each pound of the rateable value.

Held, that the water rate was not a "rate" within the meaning of the words "any other rate" in this article, but was merely the price to be paid for the water supplied, and that the water rate, therefore, was not to be included in the computation of such total.—CORPORATION OF NORTHAMPTON v. ELLEN, K.B.D.; 87 L. In 1883 the plaintiff's business was sold by the defendant, and the proceeds of the sale were with authority and consent of the plaintiff's wife expended by the defendant in the maintenance of the plaintiff's children (not of tender years) while he was in the asylum. The plaintiff upon his release in 1894 refused to ratify what had been done, and brought an action against the defendant to recover the proceeds of sale of the business.

The county court judge found that he was not engaged by the firm for any definite period, but had been from time to time employed by them, and that during the period between the 2nd and 10th of November he was not working for the firm, but that from the 11th to the 28th he was continuously in their employment. He accordingly awarded him compensation calculated on the average of his weekly earnings during the last-named period.

Held, dismissing the appeal, that, notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lord in Lysons v. Knowles & Sons, 49 W. R. 636, [1901] A. 5. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Earnings"—Deductions from wages—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.—From the weekly wages of a collier his employers deducted by agreement sums for cleaning lamps, supply of oil, sharpening picks, and checking weights.

Held, that his earnings under the Act for the purpose of estimating compensation for injury were his full wages without the deductions.—ABRAM COAL CO. v. SOUTHERN, H.L.; [1903] A. C. 306.

6. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Earnings"—Lodging allowance for goods guard—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37). Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (i.).—A goods guards in in the employment of a railway company received, in addition to his ordinary wages, a certain sum per night for "lodging allowance" when he was obliged to sleep away from home on the company's business. The object of the allowance was to cover out-of-pocket expenses to which the guard was put through having to sleep away from home, and the amount of the allowance was about equal to the reasonable cost of board and lodging for the time covered by the allowance. No inquiry was ever made by the company as to the actual expenses incurred by a guard for board and lodging, and if he boarded and lodged with a friend he would still be entitled to the allowance, and would thus make a profit out of it; but there was no evidence that any guard ever did in fact make any such profit. A guard having been killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, his widow claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, as being wholly dependent on his earnings.

Held, that in assessing the amount of compensation the "lodging allowance" must be taken as part of the "earnings" of the deceased man, within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (i.), to the Act.—SHARP v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO., C.A., 481; [1903] 2 K. 7. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Employment—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.—A workman employed in a colliery was suspended from work for the day and told to go the bottom of the pit. If he had immediately gone to the bottom of the pit he could not have been taken out of the pit for nearly three hours. Instead of going to the bottom of the pit he went into a "pass-by" and remained sitting there. When he had been there a little more than two hours he was accidentally injured by a fall of mineral. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act the county court judge held that the workman was not entitled to compensation, on the ground that, though he was not guilty of serious and wilful misconduct, the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment.

Held, that the county court judge was justified in so holding.—SMITH v. NORMANTON COLLIERY CO., C.A., 209; [1903] 1 K. B. 204; 72 L. J. K. B. 76; 88 L. T. 5

8. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Employment—Injuries received by applicant starting engine—No part of applicant's duty to start or stop engine—"Accident arising out of or in the course of" applicant's employment.—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1 (i.).—The applicant was employed as a brow girl at the respondents' colliery pit, and her work as such was to pick out rubbish from the coal as it was slowly moved along on a belt to the wagons. It was found as a fact by the county court judge that it was no part of the duty of the girls who did this work to start or stop the engine which worked the band, and that the applicant on the occasion in question was told by the other girls not to touch the engine. The man whose duty it was to start the engine being at the moment absent, the applicant started the engine herself, and her dress catching in the wheel she was drawn in and seriously injured.

Held, by Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J. (Mathew, L.J., dissenting), that as the county court judge had found as a fact that it was no part of the applicant's duty to stop or start the engine, and as there was evidence to justify such finding, the accident did not arise out of or in the course of her employment with the respondents.

Per Mathew, L.J., that there was no evidence to support the finding that it was no part of the applicant's duty to touch the engine.

12. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"On or in or about engineering work"—Construction of reservoir—Laying water-pipes—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.—A contractor had entered into a contract for the construction of a reservoir and the laying of water-pipes from the reservoir to a town about two miles away. The laying of the pipes was commenced at a point about 600 yards from the reservoir, and the work was continued towards the reservoir. The trench for the pipes had been opened for about 100 yards, and the pipe-track for the rest of the distance to the reservoir had been staked out. A workman who was employed by the contractor in laying the pipes was injured by an accident at a spot between 500 and 600 yards from the reservoir. The reservoir was being constructed by means of machinery driven by steam, but no machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power was used in laying the pipes. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge found that the laying of the pipes was a necessary part of the entire work, which was an "engineering work" within section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act, and that therefore the workman was at the time of the accident employed on that engineering work.

Held, that there was evidence upon which the county court judge could so find.—ATKINSON v. LUMB, C.A., 516; [1903] 1 K. B. 861; 72 L. J. K. B. 460; 88 L. T. 789.

The jurisdiction of the arbitrator is not limited to the making of an award to take effect from the date of the award.—MORTON v. WOODWARD, C.A., 54; [1902] 2 K. B. 276; 71 L. J. K. B. 736; 86 L. So held by Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J., Stirling, L.J., dissenting.—ELVIN v. WOODWARD, C.A., 518; [1903] 1 K. B. 838; 72 L. J. K. B. 468.

15. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contractor—"Undertaker"—Sub-contractor to find labour only for all plastering work to house—Materials supplied by contractor—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), ss. 4, 7.—The contractor for the building of a house sublet the plastering work to F., who agreed to supply and control the labour only for it, the contractor to find the materials and plant for such work.

One of F.'s workmen, while engaged on the plastering work, met with an accident, and recovered compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from the contractor.

The contractor appealed from that part of the award so far as it declared that he was not entitled to an indemnity from F.

Held, allowing the appeal, that F. had agreed to execute a substantial part of the work of construction, although only supplying and controlling the labour therefor; that he was consequently an "undertaker" in regard to that part, and that he was bound to indemnify the contractor.

The appellants contracted to erect a building and the respondent agreed with them to construct the roof. In the course of constructing the roof one of the respondent's workmen was injured, and compensation was awarded against the appellants under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Held (Lords Brampton and Robertson dissenting), that they were entitled to be indemnified by the sub-contractor under section 4 of that Act.

18. Indemnity—Amount fixed by agreement—Right to indemnity from person liable—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 6—Section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, provides that where the injury for which compensation is payable under the Act was caused under circumstances creating a legal liability in some person other than the employer to pay damages in respect of it, the workman may, at his option, "proceed, either at law against that person to recover damages, or against his employer for compensation under this Act . . . and if compensation be paid under this Act, the employer shall be entitled to be indemnified by the said other person."

Held, that the section applied where the compensation was paid under an agreement made between the injured workman and the employer after notice of the accident and of the claim for compensation had been given by the workman to the employer, but before any further proceedings had been taken.—THOMPSON & SONS v. NORTH-EASTERN MARINE ENGINEERING CO., K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. MERGER:—

1. Investment of trust moneys on mortgage—Conveyance of mortgaged land to cestui que trust.—In 1864 J. L. A. S. purchased certain land in B., and on the 4th of August, 1864, conveyed this land to the trustees of the will of the testator F. L. S. by way of mortgage. On the 7th of September, 1898, by an indenture made between J. L. A. S. of the one part and E. J. S. of the other part, J. L. A. S. conveyed the said land in B. unto E. J. S. in fee simple subject to the payment of the principal moneys and interest secured by the indenture of mortgage of the 4th of August, 1864. By another indenture of the same date, and made between the same parties, J. L. A. S. released unto E. J. S. his life estate and interest of the residuary estate of the testator J. L. S. Succession duty had not been paid by E. J. S.

Held, that the mortgage debt of £400 had not become merged in the said land in B., but passed by the residuary bequest of the personal estate of E. J. S.—SIMMONS, RE, DENNISON v. ORMAN, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 87 L. T. 594.

2. Lease—Mortgage by sub-demise—Purchase of freehold by lessee—Mortgage of freehold—Entry by mortgagee by sub-demise—Refusal to pay rent—Legal estate—Registered land—Unregistered deed—Land Transfer Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 87), s. 49—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 20—Land Transfer Rules, 1898, rr. 106, 107, 110.—The rule of equity that the question of merger must be decided by the intention of the parties applies to the merger of estates as well as to the merger of charges, and since the Judicature Act, 1873, if the circumstances are such that a court of equity would have held that there was no merger in equity, there is now no merger at law.

Accordingly, where a lessee mortgaged his leasehold interest by way of sub-demise; and subsequently purchased the freehold reversion, and then mortgaged to another both the freehold reversion and also the leasehold term, with the intention that the mortgagee of the freehold should have a security on the unincumbered freehold reversion subject to the lease; and afterwards registered himself under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, as proprietor of the premises with a possessory title, and gave a charge thereon to the last-mentioned mortgagee which was also registered,

Held, that there was no merger of the term in the freehold, and that, apart altogether from the registration, the legal estate was vested in the mortgagee of the freehold, who was entitled to re-enter upon the premises under the proviso to that effect in the original lease on non-payment by the mortgagee by sub-demise who had entered into possession of the premises of the rent reserved by the original lease.

The fact that land is on the Land Register does not prevent its being dealt with by unregistered deeds which have the same operation and effect as if the land were unregistered. The registered proprietor deals with the land by virtue of an overriding power, and not by virtue of any estate in him. Consequently, the register of proprietors is not material for the purpose of ascertaining where the legal estate in registered land is, and such legal estate may be transferred by unregistered deeds.

The special powers given to a registered proprietor to create charges in the prescribed manner do not enable him to pass the legal estate by such charges, nor do they exclude the operation and effect of a common law unregistered mortgage.

Quære, whether a conveyance of the legal estate is a "stipulation" that may properly be added to a statutory charge.

METROPOLIS:—

1. Defective drain—Works specified in detail—Notice of order—Non-compliance—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 82, 85—Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 64.—S. being the owner of certain premises, the respondents on the 5th of February served a notice on him under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, requiring him to abate a certain nuisance, being a defective drain.

On the 19th of February another notice was served requiring him to abate the nuisance and relay the drain.

On the 20th of March the public health committee of the respondents caused a notice to be served on him under the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, that the drain was defective, and requiring him to amend the same and to execute the works that the notice set out in detail. In April S. executed certain repairs to the drain, but not those in the notice of the 20th of March.

On the 18th of June the committee reported to the respondents that they had had the report of the inspector before them and had given directions for the statutory notices to be served on S., and they recommended that a notice be served on the appellant under the Act of 1855 requiring him to execute such works as were necessary to amend the drain which was in bad order, and that in the event of non-compliance proceedings should be taken.

On the 18th of June the respondents by resolution adopted this recommendation, and on the 14th of July a notice was served on S. requiring him to amend the drain, and for that purpose to execute the works that this notice set out in detail.

Held, that the notice of the 14th of July was not a notice of an order, and that S. could not be convicted for non-compliance.—SWINBOURN v. HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 597.

of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The effect of the county council's statutory powers was that they could not use the common for any purposes except such as were subordinate to the public purposes to which it had been dedicated. They received rent for a refreshment-house which was erected on the common, and they also received yearly sums in respect of grazing rights and of licences to have gateways opening on the common; but the expenses of regulating and managing the common far exceeded the receipts.

Held, that the county council were not the owners of the common within the definition of "owner" in section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to make them liable to contribute to the expenses of paving a new street on which the common abutted.

7. Street—Paving expenses—"Owner"—Building agreement—New street—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250.—The owner in fee of land made an agreement with a builder whereby it was agreed that the builder might enter upon the land and should build houses thereon, and that a lease should be granted of each house when erected, and that the builder should in the meantime pay £200 a year (which was not a rack-rent) until the leases were granted, and that "this agreement is intended to operate as an agreement only and not as an actual demise of the premises, or to give the intended lessee any legal interest therein until the leases hereinbefore agreed to be granted shall have been executed." The land had not been used, and no houses had been erected by the builder.

Held, that the builder was not the owner of the land within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

2. Sale of land—Reservation of mines and minerals—Sandstone lying under surface—Right of purchaser to quarry stone.—A deed of conveyance upon the sale of a plot of land conveyed the land to the purchaser "except all coal, ironstone, and other mines and minerals (including fireclay) lying or being within or under the lands hereby assured," and it reserved unto the owners of the excepted mines and minerals for the time being full liberty and power to work and get the coal, ironstone, and other minerals by underground working, and to use or allow lessees to use so much of the clay lying within or under the land as might be necessary for making bricks for colliery purposes; and the conveyance of another plot of the land excepted "all mines, beds, and quarries of coal, ironstone, and other minerals (including fireclay)" lying under the land. The purchaser had opened quarries for quarrying and getting certain sandstone as building stone which lay at a considerable depth below the surface.

Held, that the sandstone was included within the reservation of the minerals, and that the purchaser was not entitled to work and get the stone without the leave and licence of the vendors. In such cases the conditions or particulars of sale cannot be referred to for the purpose of explaining the subsequent deed of conveyance. — GREVILLE v. HEMINGWAY., K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 443.

3. Trustees—Power to lease.—A testator settled his real estate, making no mention of mines or minerals, and gave his trustees a general and unrestricted power of leasing any portion of his estate, but no special power of granting mining leases. After the testator's death seams of coal were discovered under a portion of his estate. There had never been any open workings of mines on any part of the estate.

Held, that the trustees might under the power demise unopened mines.—BARKER, RE, WALLIS v. BARKER, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 88 L. T. 685.

MISREPRESENTATION:—

Unauthorized use of name of another—Untrue representation that another person is connected in business with person making representation—Con- sequent liability of person about whom representation is made—Probability of injury—Interim injunction.—An injunction will be granted to restrain a person untruly representing that another is his principal or partner, or connected with him in business when there is reasonable probability of injury arising to that other from the misrepresentation.

The defendant, by circulars, advertisements, and the general conduct of his business as a dealer in cycles, was held by the court to have intended the public to believe that the proprietors of a newspaper were either his principals or responsibly connected with him in the sale of his cycles. There was a reasonable probability of the proprietors of the newspaper being exposed to litigation, and perhaps made responsible, if they had not taken steps to disconnect themselves from the defendant.

Held, that the proprietors were entitled to an interim injunction to restrain the defendant until the trial or further order from holding himself out in this manner.—WALTER v. ASHTON, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 131; [1902] 2 Ch. 282; 71 L. J. Ch. 839; 87 L. T. 196.

MONEY-LENDER:—

Harsh and unconscionable transaction—Re-opening—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 51), s. 1, sub-section 1.—A transaction may be "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, by reason of excessive interest merely, and the standard to be applied is not the same as that applied by a court of equity before the Act.

MORTGAGE:—

1. Foreclosure order nisi—Power of sale—Suspension of power.—A mortgagee obtained a foreclosure order nisi against the mortgagor. Before this order was made absolute the mortgagee sold under his power of sale.

Held, that the foreclosure order nisi did not extinguish the power of sale, but suspended the right to exercise it without the leave of the court.—STEVENS v. THEATRES (LIMITED), Ch.D. Farwell, J., 585; [1903] 1 Ch. 857; 88 L. T. 458.

Section 42 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, applies only to proceedings by the mortgagee, and has no application where he is simply resisting proceedings by the mortgagor.

3. Mortgagee in possession—Equity of redemption barred—Intestacy of mortgagee—Devolution of mortgaged land.—Testator, for three years before his death, was mortgagee in possession of freehold land, and died leaving all his real and personal property to his widow for her life, but made no disposition of the remainder expectant upon the widow's decease. The widow, as life tenant, continued in possession of the mortgaged land for many years, and during her possession the mortgagor's equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises became barred by lapse of time. Upon the widow's death, in an action for administration of the estate of the testator, the mortgagee, Held, that the mortgaged land must be treated as personalty for the purposes of devolution from the mortgagee, and passed as personalty to the next-of-kin of the testator.—LOVERIDGE, RE, DRAYTON v. LOVERIDGE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 232; [1902] 2 Ch. 859; 71 L. J. Ch. 865; 87 L. T. 294.

4. Portions—Legal charge—Equitable charge—Priority.—A testator who died in 1851, by his will, dated in 1849, charged all his real estate with the payment of three portions of £5,000 each in favour of the children of each of his three daughters upon their attaining the age of twenty-one years. In an action brought by the testator's son in 1882 for the purpose of clearing the real estate from charges, it was found that in 1880 two of the portions had become raisable, but that the tenant for life of the third portion was still alive.

On the 17th of May, 1882, an order was made directing that the two portions then raisable should be raised by a mortgage of the real estate to a person who was willing to lend the money, such mortgage to be settled by the judge. The mortgage deed, dated the 21st of July, 1883, so settled contained recitals of the title to the portions, and of the proceedings of the action, and was expressed to be made as to all the hereditaments comprised therein "without prejudice to any charge which may be subsisting therein under the said will," but was in other respects in the ordinary form of a mortgage in fee. All the testator's real estate was thereby mortgaged for £10,862. The mortgagee duly paid the money into court, and it was afterwards applied in payment of the two portions of £5,000 to the persons interested in the same, the costs incidental to the transaction, and a small sum for freeing copyholds.

An action was subsequently brought by the mortgagee for the realization of his security and for the purpose of establishing his priority as first mortgagee in respect of the £10,862 advanced by him over the third portion of £5,000 which under the will had yet to be raised out of the same estate, it appearing that the estate would be unable to bear the full burden of all the charges.

Held, that the third portion, although as yet only charged in equity by virtue of the will, ranked pari passu with the mortgagee's legal charge sanctioned by the court.—NIGHTINGALE v. REYNOLDS, C.A.; [1903] 2 Ch. 236; 72 L. J. Ch. 564; 88 L. T. 654.

5. Receiver appointed on behalf of second mortgagees — Motion by first mortgagee to obtain possession and to discharge the receiver — Back rents in the hands of the receiver — Right of first mortgagee.—On a motion by the first mortgagee of certain premises to discharge a receiver appointed on behalf of the second mortgagees, it was asked that the receiver should pay to the first mortgagee all rents and profits in his hands. He received certain rents between the notice of motion and the order thereon giving the first mortgagee possession.

Held, that the first mortgagee was entitled to receive these rents, for he must be considered to be in possession from the date of the notice of motion, and not merely from the date of the order made on the notice of motion.—PRESTON v. TUNBRIDGE WELLS OPERA HOUSE, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 323; 88 L. T. 53.

6. Redemption—Clog on equity of redemption—Collateral advantage to mortgagee—Advantage continuing after redemption—Mortgage of shares—Employment of mortgagee as broker.—Collateral stipulations in a mortgage cease to operate on redemption, so that a mortgage security cannot validly provide that the mortgagee shall obtain any advantage which arises after or goes beyond the time when the principal, costs, and interest are repaid, for such would be a fetter upon the mortgagor's right to redeem.

Where, therefore, a holder of shares in a tea company mortgaged them to secure an advance, and at the same time agreed to use his best endeavours to secure that the mortgagee should always thereafter have the sale of all the company's teas as broker, and the mortgage was paid off.

Held (Lords Shand and Lindley dissenting), that as the bargain between the parties was at an end upon the repayment of the loan, the agreement as as to employing the broker after that time was invalid.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (49 W. R. 593, [1901] 2 K. B. 550) reversed.—BRADLEY v. CARRITT, H.L., 636; [1903] A. C. 253; 72 L. J. K. B. 471; 88 L. T. 633.

7. Redemption—Independent agreement—Once a mortgage always a mortgage—Option to lender to enter into partnership—Sale or mortgage.—Where mortgagor and mortgagee entered into an arrangement dealing with the equity of redemption of certain property and making certain terms as to a possible partnership,

Held, that as the arrangement was subsequent and independent of the mortgage, and that as there was nothing unconscionable or unfair in the transaction, the agreement was binding.

8. Redemption action—Costs of mortgagee.—A customer of a bank deposited certain shares with the bank as security for a loan, with a memorandum of deposit. The bank afterwards obtained judgment against her in respect of the debt, when an arrangement was made under which her husband guaranteed payment of part of it by instalments. The bank sued him on his guarantee, and obtained judgment with costs; and, although the wife's debt to them had now been satisfied, they declined to retransfer the shares to her until these costs were paid. In an action by her against the bank to obtain a retransfer of the shares or their value,

Held, that the action was in effect one of redemption; that the costs of the action against the husband were properly incurred, and the wife was bound to indemnify him against them; and that the bank were entitled to the benefit of the indemnity and to retain the shares till payment of the costs of the action against him.—SACHS v. ASHBY & Co., K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 393.

9. Redemption action—Security for loan—Stipulation that mortgagee may purchase mortgage security at fixed price within definite time—Clog on equity of redemption.—A stipulation in a mortgage that the mortgagee shall have the option to purchase the whole or any part of the mortgaged security at a fixed price within a definite time is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption. The rule against clogging an equity of redemption applies as much to a mortgage by a company of its debenture stock as to other mortgages.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (50 W. R. 601, [1902] 2 Ch. 479), affirmed.—JARRAH TIMBER, &c., CORPORATION v. SAMUEL, C.A., 439; [1903] 2 Ch. 1; 88 L. T. 106.

10. Registration of deeds—Equitable mortgage—Deposit of title-deeds—Antecedent debt—Priority—6 Anne Ir. c. 2, ss. 3, 5.—A customer of a bank having overdrawn his account undertook by letter to deposit a title-deed of an Irish estate as security. He deposited the title-deed with the bank, who did not register the charge. The customer afterwards mortgaged the estate to the appellants, who registered their charge without notice of the prior charge.

Held, that the customer's letter amounted to an agreement to create an equitable charge upon the estate and ought to have been registered under 6 Anne Ir. c. 2, and that in default of registration it ranked after the mortgage to the appellants.—FULLERTON v. PROVINCIAL BANK OF IRELAND, H.L.; 1903 A. Practice—Writ—Non-compliance by trustee with order to pay money into court—Evidence of actual receipt—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4 (3).—The circumstances under which the court will allow a writ ne exeat regno to issue must be such as would justify the issue of a writ of attachment, and in addition the evidence as to the intention of the defendant to leave the country must be direct and unequivocal.—UNDERWOOD, RE, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 335.

NEGLIGENCE:—

1. Action for personal injury—Invitation to travel on engine—Duty to take reasonable care—Liability for negligence of servants.—Held, on the facts, that the defendant must be taken through his servant to have permitted the plaintiff to ride on the engine, and that his liability was that of a person who undertakes the carriage of another gratuitously; that the duty in such a case is that the care exercised must be reasonable under the circumstances, that there was evidence of want of due care on the part of the defendant's servant, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.—HARRIS v. PERRY, C.A.; [1903] 2 K. B. 219.

2. Liability of railway company—Intervening act of third party—Effective cause of damage.—A railway company is not responsible for injury to a person using a highway caused by a brake-van which the interference of trespassers has sent running down an inclined siding on to the highway, where the danger of such interference as a probable cause of injury to persons using the highway was not known to the company, and where independently of such interference the brake-van was in a position and condition not at the time dangerous.—MCDOWALL v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY, C.A.; 72 L. J. K. B. 652; 88 L. T. 825.

3. Lift accident—Servant injured—Lack of knowledge of danger by both master and servant—Defect in lift—Deduction by jury from plan—Liability.—Where a lift, defective through the absence of an inner gate, has become dangerous owing to cleaning with oil by the order of a fellow servant given with the sanction of the master, and there is a neglect to give the servant working the lift proper directions as to its working, the master will be liable if such servant working the lift is injured, even although the danger is not known to the master or his superintendent, and is not known to the servant so injured. Where a plan of a lift is put in, but no evidence as to defective construction is given, the jury are entitled to form their own opinion as to the construction of such lift.—LLOYD v. WOOLLAND BROTHERS, K.B.D.; 87 L. NEW SOUTH WALES, LAW of:—

1. Civil servant—Additional years of service need not be continuous—Terms of special leave allowing respondent to cross-appeal without petition—Costs—New South Wales Civil Service Act, 1884, s. 48—Construction.—Where an officer within the meaning of the New South Wales Civil Service Act, 1884, held office as a civil servant from 1857 to 1861, then was employed by the Government from 1861 to 1880 as a licensed surveyor but not as an officer as aforesaid, then as an officer from 1880 to 1896, when he was superannuated,

Held, that the years of service from 1857 to 1861 were additional years within the meaning of section 48, entitling him to a superannuation allowance in respect thereof. There was nothing in the Act to show that the service in respect of which allowance was provided must be continuous.

Special leave granted on special terms as to costs, reserving to respondent a right to cross-appeal without petition to that effect.—WALKER v. SIMPSON, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 208; 72 L. J. P. C. 58; 88 L. T. 306.

2. Crown Lands Acts, 1884, 1889, 1895—Licence fees—Reappraisement — Forfeiture for non-payment of fees—Crown Lands Amendment Act, 1891.—The holder of an "occupation licence" of Crown lands under the Crown Lands Acts of New South Wales, who has applied for a reappraisement of the lands held by him under such licence, is not liable to pay licence fees at the former rate pending such reappraisement, and cannot be held in default for not doing so, and the Crown has no power to refuse to renew the licence on that ground.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

A grant of an occupation licence is within the words "contract for the purchase or leasing of Crown lands" in the interpretation clause of the Crown Lands Amendment Act, 1891 (55 Vict. No. 1.).—O'KEEFE v. MALONE, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 365; 88 L. T. 644.

3. Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, s. 11, sub-section (v.)—Charitable purpose—Exclusive use—Exemption.—Certain glebe lands were vested in trustees by Crown grant for the purposes of promoting religion and education in New South Wales. Under these powers the trustees granted building leases of part; the remainder were waste lands and not physically occupied or used for any purpose. The rents were applied, as authorized, for purposes of the trust connected with a church.

Held, that the lands were not "occupied or used exclusively for or in connection with public charitable purposes, churches, &c.," within the meaning of section 11, sub-section (v.), of the Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, and were not therefore exempt from assessment.—COMMISSIONERS OF TAXATION v. TRUSTEES OF ST. MARK'S GLEBE, P.C., 33; [1902] A. C. 416; 71 L. J. P. C. 99; 86 L. T. 629.

NEW ZEALAND, LAW of:—

1. Probate duty—Exemption—Widow absolutely entitled under husband's will to residuary estate—Power of appointment.—A testator by his will left all his residuary real and personal estate upon trust for his wife for life for her sole use and benefit absolutely; and after her decease for such person or persons as she should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, to certain persons and objects mentioned in his will. The widow, in exercise of the power of appointment, appointed the residuary trust funds to herself absolutely, subject to her life interest therein.

Held, that by the Deceased Persons Estates Duties Acts, 1881 and 1885 (No. 41 of 1881 and No. 53 of 1885), the duty payable was made a charge upon the property as from the date of the death, and that the subsequent appointment passed the property subject to the liability to pay duty; and, further, that the widow did not become absolutely entitled to the property under the will, so as to be entitled to exemption from duty under section 18 of the Act of 1885.—JACKSON v. COMMISSIONER OF STAMPS, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 350; 72 L. J. P. C. 68; 88 L. T. 480.

2. Prohibited goods, forfeiture of, by innocent holder—New Zealand Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1889, No. 12, ss. 89, 104—Construction.—Matchboxes, belonging to the respondents, stamped "New Zealand" but filled with London matches, thus bearing a false trade description, were seized on arrival in New Zealand as contraband. It was conceded that there was no fraudulent intention, or any intention to transgress the law of the colony.

In an action against the appellant contesting the legality of the seizure,

Held, that under sections 89 and 104 of the New Zealand Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1889, reproducing the Imperial Merchandize Marks Act, 1887, ss. 2, 16, the seizure must be upheld as of goods whose importation was prohibited. The only remedy was under section 267 of the Customs Laws Consolidation Act, 1882, by means of an application to the Governor.—COMMISSIONER OF TRADE v. BELL & Co., P.C.; [1902] A. C. 563; 71 L. NUISANCE:—

Notice to abate served on adjoining owners—Intercommunication of drainage system for the two houses—Work to that part of the drain that served both houses done by plaintiff—Claim against defendant for half of the expenses of this work—Rights of parties inter se—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 104.—The plaintiff and the defendant were the owners of adjoining houses which were drained by a system that met under the plaintiff's premises, and from that point the sewage of both houses passed along a single pipe into the main sewer.

Separate notices were served by the local authority on the owners to abate a nuisance on their respective premises. The plaintiff had the necessary work done, including the connecting of the defendant's drain to the common connection with the sewer. This operation benefited the defendant, and the plaintiff claimed to be repaid half the expense of this part of the work.

The county court judge decided that the defendant was not liable.

Held (dismissing the plaintiff's appeal), that there was no legal responsibility on the defendant, either by statute or at common law, to indemnify the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff could not recover. —REEVE v. SADLER, K.B.D., 603; 88 L. T. 95.

PARTNERSHIP:—

1. Article empowering a partner to nominate and introduce a new partner—Refusal of other partners to accept nominee — Remedies of nominee. — Under partnership articles a partner was entitled to nominate and introduce into the firm, for the whole or any part of his share, a son or any other male person. The partner having nominated his son by writing addressed to the other partners, they refused to accept the son as a partner, and the father accordingly brought an action claiming a declaration that the son was duly nominated and introduced into the firm.

Held, on the facts, that the son was validly nominated and introduced, and that under these circumstances the remedy did not lie in damages only, but that the son, though not entitled to specific performance, was entitled to other equitable relief as having become a partner in equity.

Discussion by Stirling, L.J., as to the relief afforded to partners by courts of equity.—BYRNE v. REID, C.A., 52; [1902] 2 Ch. 735; 71 L. J. Ch. 830; 87 L. T. 507.

4. Practice—Partners—Judgment against firm—Execution—Liability as member of firm—Holding out—Issue—Ord. 48A, r. 8.—A writ was issued against H. & Co., and served under ord. 4A, r. 3, at the principal place of business of the defendant firm on the person having the control or management of the business there. An appearance was entered in the name of H. H., sued as H. & Co. The plaintiff, having obtained judgment, took out a summons under ord. 48A, r. 8, asking that an issue might be ordered to be tried to determine whether S. M. H. was liable to have execution levied against him on the judgment.

Held, that one of the questions to be tried in the issue ought to be whether S. M. H. had held himself out as a partner in the defendant firm.—DAVIS v. HYMAN, C.A., 598; [1903] 1 K. B. 854; 72 L. J. K. B. 426; 88 L. T. 284.

PATENT:—

1. Amendment of specification—Petition for revocation presented during proceedings for amendment—Jurisdiction of comptroller—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 18 (10), 19—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 5.—A patentee applied under section 18 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, for leave to amend his specification by way of disclaimer. After the application had been made, but before the comptroller had given his decision, the defendants in this action presented a petition for revocation of the patent. The comptroller subsequently granted the patentee leave to amend. The patentee brought this action to restrain the defendants from infringing his patent as amended The defendants pleaded that the patent had not been duly amended, on the ground that the presentation of their petition had ousted the comptroller's jurisdiction to hear and determine by virtue of section 18 (10) of the Act of 1883, as amended by section 5 of the Act of 1888, unless leave was first obtained from the court under section 19 of the Act of 1883.

Held, that the application to amend having, in the first place, been properly made at a time when no action for infringement or proceeding for revocation was pending, could be proceeded with and adjudicated upon by the comptroller without leave of the court, notwithstanding that a petition for revocation had been presented before final adjudication, and that liberty to amend the specification of the patent had been duly given.—WOOLFE'S PATENT, RE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 121; affirmed [1903] 1 Ch. 18.

2. Infringement—Action relating to numerous separate patents—Joinder of causes of action—Prejudice, embarrass, or delay fair trial of action—Limitation to a few of the patents.—The plaintiffs brought an action for the alleged infringement by the defendants of twenty-three different letters patent, all of which related to the manufacture of the same chemical substance. A summons was taken out by the defendants asking that the plaintiffs might be ordered to give a further and better statement of the nature of their claim, and further particulars of breaches specifying which of the twenty-three letters patent therein mentioned they relied on as having been infringed by the defendants; and (or) that an order should be made limiting the trial of the action in the first instance to such of the twenty-three letters patent as to the court might seem just.

Held, that the defendants ought not to be embarrassed by claims based upon so large a number of different letters patent; but that the plaintiffs' claim should be limited to such three of the letters patent as they might select.—SACCHARIN CORPORATION v. WILD, C.A.; [1903] 1 Ch. 410; 72 L. 3. Infringement — Action relating to numerous separate patents—Joinder of causes of action—"Prejudice, embarrass, or delay fair trial of action"—Limitation of claim—"In the first instance"—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 29, sub-sections 2, 3—Ord. 18, rr. 1, 8, 9—Ord. 19, r. 27.—Where an action is brought for the alleged infringement of numerous different letters patent all relating to the same process of manufacture, the order limiting the number of letters patent to be sued upon should not be qualified by the words "in the first instance."

Saccharin Corporation (Limited) v. Wild & Co., 88 L. T. Rep. 101, [1903] 1 Ch. 410, explained.

Order of Farwell, J., varied. — SACCHARIN CORPORATION v. WHITE, C.A.; 88 L. T. 850.

4. Infringement—Service out of the jurisdiction—Foreign manufacturers soliciting orders in England—Using, exercising, or vending invention—Primâ facie evidence of breach within the jurisdiction.—A foreign company owning English letters patent for the manufacture of certain articles commenced an action against another company, also domiciled abroad, for alleged infringement of those letters patent. Subsequently the plaintiffs obtained an order for service upon the defendants out of the jurisdiction. That order the defendants moved to discharge. It was admitted that the defendants had by their agents solicited from persons in England orders for articles to be executed and delivered abroad; but it was contended that this did not amount to using, exercising, or vending the invention claimed by the plaintiffs' letters patent.

Held, that the evidence before the court showed information coming from perfectly trustworthy persons which pointed to infringement by the defendants of the plaintiffs' letters patent within the jurisdiction; that the Legislature had not imposed upon the court the duty of trying the action before giving leave for service on the defendants out of the jurisdiction in order to have the parties before the court; that if there was primâ facie evidence the necessary conditions had been fulfilled that there had been a breach within the jurisdiction; and that there were sufficient facts to raise the question which the court was not bound at present to finally decide—viz., that the acts of the defendants amounted to infringements. — BADISCHE ANILIN UND SODA FABRIK v. CHEMISCHE FABRIK VORMALS SANDOZ, C.A.; 88 L. T. 490.

5. Prolongation — Insufficiency of accounts — Practice.—The accounts presented to the committee on an application for an extension of a patent must be intelligible and complete, shewing what remuneration the patentee has actually received. He cannot be allowed, except perhaps in very special circumstances, to supplement them by oral evidence.—WUTERICH'S PATENT, RE, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 206; 72 L. J. P. C. 60; 88 L. T. 306.

PERPETUITY:—

1. Appointment — Personal estate — Remoteness — "Possibility on a possibility."—The old rule against "a possibility on a possibility," though applicable to legal limitations of real estate—namely, that although an estate may be limited to an unborn person for his life, yet a remainder cannot be limited to the children of that unborn person, as purchasers—does not apply to personal estate; as regards limitations of personal estate the ordinary rule against perpetuities is the only rule applicable.—BOWLES, RE, AMEDROZ v. BOWLES, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 124; [1902] 2 Ch. 650; 71 L. J. Ch. 822.

2. Remoteness—Devise to son of M. for life with remainders to such son's issue—Son en ventre sa mère —Relation back.—For the purpose of the rule against perpetuities an infant en ventre sa mère is to be treated as a living person, whether such assumption is to the advantage of the infant or not.

A. devised her real estate to trustees upon trust to pay the income to her daughter M. for life, and, after her death, by way of equitable contingent remainders (in the events which happened) to the third son of M, born or to be born, for life, and after his death for his first and other sons successively in order of seniority in tail male. A. died in 1880. S. T., the third son of M., was then en ventre sa mère. He was born in 1881. In 1902 S. T., acting on the assumption that the limitations subsequent to his own life estate were void for remoteness, took out a summons against the trustees of the will for a declaration that, on the true construction of the will, and in the events which had happened, he had, on attaining the age of twenty-one years, become entitled as tenant in tail male in possession to the real estate so devised.

Held, affirming the decision of Buckley, J. (ante, p. 395, [1903] 1 Ch. 874), that the limitations did not transgress the rule against perpetuities, and that the sons of S. T. took valid estates in tail male in remainder.—WILMER, RE, MOORE v. WINGFIELD, C.A., 609; 72 L. J. Ch. 670

POLICE:—

Pension — "Annual pay" — Special allowance—Police Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45), s. 1, Schedule I.—By the Police Act, 1890 a constable is entitled after completing a certain time of service, to a pension, to be calculated "according to the amount of his annual pay at the date of his retirement."

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that a special allowance paid to a constable in addition to his ordinary pay, in respect of permanent special duty, was not "annual pay" within the meaning of the Act, and could not be taken into account in calculating the amount of the retiring pension to which he was entitled.—UPPERTON v. RIDLEY, H.L.; [1903] A. POOR LAW:—

1. Law of Scotland—Wife deserted—Acquiring settlement.—Under the Scotch law, where a husband deserts his wife she cannot acquire a settlement for herself; the fact of the desertion cannot avail to alter the liability of the husband's parish to support his wife and children.—RUTHERGLEN PARISH COUNCIL v. GLASGOW PARISH COUNCIL, H.L., 65; [1902] A. C. 360; 86 L. T. 607.

2. Rating—Appeal to special sessions—Notice of appeal to parish council—Parochial Assessment Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96). s. 6—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c 73), s. 6, sub-section 1; s. 52, sub-section 5.—In all cases where an appeal is made under section 6 of the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836, to special sessions against a poor rate made in a rural parish having a parish council, it is, since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1894, a condition precedent that notice of appeal should have been given to the parish council.—REX v. TEWKESBURY JUSTICES, K.B.D., 285; [1903] 1 K. B. 39; 72 L. J. K. B. 41; 87 L. T. 583.

3. Rating—Rateable value—Waterworks—Intake from river—Sum paid for right to take water—Assessment.—A waterworks company had the right by statute to take a certain amount of water from a river by means of an intake where there was a building containing appliances for measuring the water passing through the intake into a channel communicating therewith. The company were required by statute to pay to the conservators of the river certain sums for the right to take the water.

Held, that, in rating the intake, beyond the ordinary value of the land with the building on it its enhanced value in respect of its special fitness for taking water from the river and the user made of it for that purpose must be taken into account, but that the sums paid for the water were not elements in its rateable value.

Therefore where an epileptic was sent by his friends to a home, whose object was to cure patients mainly by outdoor exercise and recreation,

Held, that it was a "hospital" within the meaning of the section, and that residence for seven years in the home did not give the patient a settlement in the union where the home was situate.—ORMSKIRK UNION v. CHORLTON UNION, K.B.D., 190; [1903] 1 K. B. 19; 71 L. J. K. B. 989; 87 L. T. 446.

PORTIONS.—See Mortgage, 4.

POWER:—

1. Appointment—General power to appoint by will—Security for loan—Covenant to appoint—Priority—General debt—Liability of appointed fund.—Where there is a general power to appoint by will only, an appointment by will made in favour of a creditor in pursuance of a covenant in a mortgage in consideration of money lent to the donee of the power during his lifetime will not give that creditor priority over the other creditors of the donee's estate.—LAWLEY RE, ZAISER v. LAWLEY, C.A., 150; [1902] 2 Ch. 799; 71 L J. Ch. 895; 87 L. T. 536.

2. Appointment—Appointment to two objects—Subsequent appointments amongall objects equally—Substitution—Election—Forfeiture on assigning or attempting to assign—Settlement—Assignment to trustees—Trusts for sole benefit of settlor—Power to charge expenses.—£7,000 was settled on trust for a husband and wife during their respective lives, and after their death as they or the survivor should appoint among objects. The husband and wife, by two deeds, irrevocably appointed one-seventh to each of two objects. After the death of the husband, the wife, by two deeds, irrevocably appointed the whole of the £7,000 among all the objects equally. On the death of the wife,

Held, that no case of election had arisen; that on the construction of the four deeds it was evident that the donee intended the £7,000 to be divisible in equal shares, and, that, consequently, it was so divisible.

In re Ashton, 46 W. R. 138, [1897] 2 Ch. 574, distinguished.

Property was appointed to an object of a power for a life, with a forfeiture clause in case he should assign, charge, or otherwise dispose or attempt to dispose of his life interest. By the object's marriage settlement he assigned his life interest, together with other property, to trustees, and appointed them his attorneys to receive it. The property settled was charged with expenses management. The trusts of the property settled were, during his life, for his sole benefit.

Held, that his life interest was not forfeited.—TANCRED'S SETTLEMENT, RE, SOMERVILLE v. TANCRED, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 510; [1903] 1 Ch. 715; 72 L. J. Ch. 324; 88 L. T. 164.

3. Appointment—Real estate—Legal estate in trustees of instrument creating power—Execution—Devise to trustees of will on trust for sale and appointment of proceeds among objects.—The principle of Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Ves. 793, that a power of appointing real estate authorizes a devise to trustees for sale and an appointment of the money produced by the sale, applies to a case where the legal estate is vested in the trustees of the instrument creating the power.

A deed contained a limitation of real estate to the use of trustees upon trust to convey the same to such issue of the donee of the power, and "for such estate or estates, manner, and form" as she should by will appoint.

Held, that the power was well exercised by a devise by the donee, of the real estate to trustees of her will upon trust for sale and division of the proceeds among objects of the power.—REDGATE, RE, MARSH v. REDGATE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 216; [1903] 1 Ch. 355; 72 L. J. Ch. 204.

4. Appointment—Settled land—Lease by appointor after exercise of power by will—Lease with premium—"Capital money"—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), ss. 24, 27—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 22, sub-section 5—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), s. 4.—Real estate was settled for A. H. B. for his life, and after his death for his children as he should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for his children generally as therein provided. A. H. B. appointed part of the estate to one son and part to another, and afterwards granted leases under the Settled Land Act, 1882, of parts of the appointed property and received large premiums, which were paid to trustees of the settlement and invested.

Held, that the appointments did not include the premiums, for the will of A. H. B. showed no intention of dealing with them, and therefore they went as in default of appointment under the settlement.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (sub. nom. Beddington v. Beddington, In re Moses, [1902] 1 Ch. 100. 50 W. R. Dig. 131) affirmed.

Gale v. Gale, 4 W. R. 277, 21 Beav. 349, approved.—BEDDINGTON v. BAUMANN, H.L., 383; [1903] A.C. 13; 72 L. J. Ch. 155; 87 L. T. 658.

5. Determination—Intention of donor that power should continue—Absolute vesting of estate—Incapacity of person entitled.—The question as to when a power of sale given to trustees becomes extinguished is a question of the intention of the donor of the power. Accordingly, where the beneficial interest in trust property has vested absolutely, but a conveyance of the property from the trustees has not been called for, the trustees' power of sale continues to exist in every case where this appears to have been the intention.

The reversion to property, held by trustees upon trusts for a lunatic for his life and with wide discretionary powers, became vested in the lunatic.

Held, that, nevertheless, the trustees were entitled to exercise their power of sale.—JUMP, RE, GALLOWAY v. HOPE, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 266; [1903] 1 Ch. 129; 72 L. J. Ch. 16; 87 L. T. 502.

6. Jointure—Validity of exercise—No disentailing deed—Statute—Private Act—Construction—Application of later Act to earlier.—By a private Act of Parliament passed in 1835 certain manors and estates were settled upon tenants in tail, with a proviso that they should not alien, bargain, give or sell the same, nor do any other thing to the hurt or disinheritance of their heirs, but only for the jointure of a wife, or for term of life of a husband, or for term of life of any other person or for years or at will after the custom of the manor, yielding the true and ancient rent, but that all other acts contrary to the true intent of the Act should be void. A tenant in tail who died in 1902 purported to exercise the power of jointuring in favour of his widow by a codicil,

Held, that on the construction of the Act neither fine nor recovery nor any disentailing assurance was necessary to the exercise of the power, and that it was well exercised by testamentary disposition.—BOLTON ESTATES ACTS, RE, C.A.; 72 L. J. Ch. 605; 88 L. T. 851.

7. Lease to donee of power and others—Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18)—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38)—Covenant to pay rent—Validity of lease—Lease to trustee for donee.—A lease granted by a donee of a power of leasing to himself or to himself and others is ipso facto void.

Semble, except in the case of certain powers of ancient creation, where uniform practice since their creation has been held to show that a special construction must be put on the power, a lease by a donee of a power to a trustee for himself is void.

Bevan v. Habgood, 8 W. R. 703, 1 Joh. & H. 222, discussed.

A tenant for life purported to grant a lease under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, to a firm in which he was himself a partner; the lease contained covenants for a payment of rent, &c., by the "lessees," who were defined as being the donee and his partners and their executors, administrators, and assigns.

Held, that the lease was void; first, because in fact the rent received was not the best obtainable; secondly, because there was during the life of the tenant for life no enforceable covenant; thirdly, because the lease was to the donee himself with others.—BOYCE v. EDBROOKE, *Ch.D. PRACTICE:—

1. Appeal—House of Lords—New trial—Entering judgment for the defendant—Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1884, r. 4.—Where the House of Lords comes to the conclusion that there is no evidence to go to a jury in an action, they will order judgment to be entered for the defendant, and not send the case for a new trial; and this will be done though there is no cross-appeal on the defendant's part.—IBO SYNDICATE v. WYLER, H.L., 320; 87 L. T. 83.

2. Appeal in formâ pauperis—Appeal to Privy Council without leave—New South Wales, Law of.—It is a rule of general, if not universal, application that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council will not entertain a petition for leave to prosecute an appeal in formâ pauperis, where the court below has power to grant leave on the usual conditions, unless leave has been applied for within due time to the court from which it is proposed that the appeal should be brought.—WALKER v. WALKER, P.C., 658; [1903] A. C. 170; 72 L. J. P. C. 36; 88 L. T. 133.

3. Appeal—Jurisdiction—Certiorari.—Under the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and the Irish Judicature Act, 1877, no appeal lies to the House of Lords in cases in which there was no appeal before the passing of those Acts, and consequently there is no appeal from the Irish Court of Appeal in a case of certiorari.—REX v. BARTON, H.L.; 87 L. T. 82.

4. Appeal—Order whether final or interlocutory—Order to try preliminary question of liability—Action dismissed—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 58, rr. 3 and 15.—In an action for breach of contract the judge at chambers made the following order: "It is ordered that the action be transferred to the non-jury list. Questions of liability and breach of contract only to be tried. Rest of case (if any) to go to the official referee."

At the trial the judge made an order dismissing the action on the ground that there was no binding contract, and judgment was entered for the defendants. From this order the plaintiff appealed.

Held, that the appeal must be treated as an appeal from a final order, and not as from an interlocutory order.

5. Commission to examine witnesses—Fees and expenses of examiner—Order for commission on application of one party—Witnesses examined on behalf of both parties—Liability of party obtaining order to pay all fees and expenses to examiner—Ord. 37, r. 50.—The party who obtains an order for the examination of witnesses before an examiner, which gives liberty to the other parties to examine witnesses, may properly be ordered under ord. 37, r. 50, to pay to the examiner all his fees and expenses of the examination, including those on account of the examination of witnesses on behalf of the other party.—LINLEY v. HOULDER, C.A.; 88 L. T. 829.

6. Compromise—Authority of counsel—Reference of action—Limitation of authority to agree to terms.—When restrictions are placed by a client upon his counsel's authority to compromise or to agree to certain terms, and consent is given by counsel, disregarding those restrictions, such consent is not binding on the client, even in the case of the other side being unaware of them.

Where, therefore, counsel agreed to a reference, without providing for a special condition imposed by his client and unknown to the opposite party, the order for preference was set aside and a new trial ordered.

7. Costs—Court of Appeal—Witness not called—Taxing-master's discretion—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 4; ord. 65, r. 27 (29).—Where special leave to adduce certain evidence before the Court of Appeal had not been obtained, and a witness who was present to give this evidence was not called upon, the taxing-master held that he had discretion under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27 (29), to allow the costs of this witness.

Held, that there was nothing on which the taxing-master could exercise his discretion, and that the costs of the witness should be disallowed.—LEEDS FORGE CO. v. DEIGHTON'S PATENT FLUE CO., Ch.D. Farwell, J., 380; [1903] 1 Ch. 475; 72 L. J. Ch. 294; 87 L. T. 711.

9. Costs—Payment into court—Other issues raised.—In an action for trespass and wrongful distraint the defendants, in addition to raising certain defences, paid a certain sum of money into court with a denial of liability. The jury found a verdict against the defendants for a less sum than that paid in.

Held (although the defendants were entitled to the costs of the action), that the plaintiff, in addition to his costs up to the time of payment into court, was entitled to the costs of the other issues raised by the defendants.—RIDOUT v. GREEN, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 679.

11. Costs—Taxation—Chancery Division—Apportionment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 2.—Plaintiffs in an action claimed an injunction against defendants restraining them from interrupting an access to the plaintiffs' premises, and they also claimed damages for trespass. Defendants paid £60 into court in lieu of damages for trespass. Plaintiffs failed on the first issue, and accepted the sum of £60 paid into court as satisfaction of the second issue. The court dismissed the first part of the action without costs, but the defendants were ordered to pay the costs of the second part of the action. The taxing-master allowed the plaintiffs all the general costs of the action, so far as related to the issue upon which the plaintiffs were successful. The defendants objected that the order of the court involved an apportionment of the general costs of the action, and that if it had been intended that the plaintiffs were to recover the whole of the general costs the order would have directed the defendants to pay the plaintiffs "their costs of this action except so far as such costs have been increased by the issue upon which the plaintiffs have been unsuccessful." The taxing-master, in reply, referred to the addition to ord. 65, r. 2, in R. S. C., 1902, and stated that this rule gave effect to the established practice of the King's Bench Division.

Held, that the effect of the addition to ord. 65, r. 2, was to give the judge power to make an apportionment of the costs in the action. The practice in the Chancery Division had not been altered, and remained as it was laid down in Jenkins v. Jackson, 39 W. R. 242 [1891] 1 Ch. 89.—TODD v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO., *Ch.D. Held, therefore, that a Chancery taxing-master was entitled to tax the costs of a compensation case under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

14. Costs — Taxation — Two defendants jointly represented—Judgment for one defendant and against the other—Plaintiff liable to pay half the costs of the defence — Practice. — Where two defendants are jointly represented by the same solicitor, and judgment and costs is given in favour of one defendant and against the other, the successful defendant is, in the absence of any agreement between him and his co-defendant as to how their costs are to be borne inter se, entitled to recover from the plaintiff half the costs of the defence.—BEAUMONT v. SENIOR, K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. 15. Costs—Trial by jury—Successful defendant—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9)—Defendant's right to costs — "Good cause."—A statement of defence contained a plea based on the Gaming Act, 1892. At the trial of the action before a judge and jury this plea was admitted by the plaintiff to be a good defence to the action; and thereupon, without any evidence being called, the judge directed the jury to find for the defendant, and he gave judgment accordingly, but without costs. The defendant appealed from so much of the judgment as deprived him of costs.

Held, that there was nothing before the judge which could constitute "good cause" for depriving the defendant of his right to costs under ord. 65, r. 1.—GRANVILLE v. FIRTH, C.A.; 72 L. J. K. B. 152; 88 L. T. 9.

16. Discovery—Several defendants—Discovery by one defendant—Deposit—Inspection by co-defendant—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, rr. 12, 14-18, 26.—Where one of several defendants has obtained discovery from the plaintiff on payment of the usual deposit, it is competent for the court to order the production to another defendant of such documents relating to the matters in question between the plaintiff and that particular defendant as the plaintiff has admitted in his affidavit to the first defendant to be in his possession or power, without any further affidavit of documents, on the terms that, notwithstanding the order, the plaintiff may be at liberty to withhold on oath or seal up documents not relating to the matter in issue between the plaintiff and that particular defendant.

C.*, 1883, ord. 37, rr. 35, 36.—In an action to perpetuate testimony the plaintiff is not entitled as of right to an order for the examination of witnesses, although the action is properly brought within the terms of ord. 37, r. 35. The court has a discretion as to whether it will make the order or not, and the fact that the matter in controversy can be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation is a fact which the court will take into consideration in exercising that discretion.—WEST v. SACKVILLE, C.A., 625; 72 L. 18. Parties—Title to sue—Contract entered into on behalf of a foreign State—There is no such rule as that the monarch or other titular head of a foreign sovereign State is the only person who can sue here in respect of the public property or interest of that State.

The Spanish Minister of Marine in Madrid and two other persons brought an action in the Court of Session against the respondents for damages for failure to deliver warships within the time stipulated by contract. The parties to the contract were described as "The Chief of the Spanish Royal Navy Commission," and "the Commissary of the Commission (mentioning names) both in the name and representation of his Excellency the Spanish Minister of Marine in Madrid, hereinafter called the Spanish Government on the one part," and the respondents (a shipbuilding company in Scotland) on the other part.

Held, reversing the decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session, (1901) 4 F. 319, that the Spanish Minister of Marine for the time being was entitled to maintain the action though he was not Minister of Marine at the date of the contract.—CASTANEDA v. CLYDEBANK ENGINEERING AND SHIPBUILDING CO., H L; [1902] A. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT:—

1. Auctioneer—Indemnity—Act done by auctioneer in course of his employment—Damages awarded against him on mistaken view of facts.—The plaintiff, an auctioneer, was instructed by the defendants to put up to auction in Paris a thoroughbred mare named Pentecost, which they represented as having been then for the first time imported into France. The plaintiff thereupon advertised the mare for sale. There was another mare of the same name entered in the French Stud-book, and the owner of this mare brought an action in the French courts against the present plaintiff, alleging that the true mare Pentecost, of which he was the owner, had been previously imported into France. The owner of the mare recovered judgment against the present plaintiff, who was condemned to pay damages.

In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for an indemnity in respect of the damages he had suffered,

Held, that there was evidence that the mare sent by the defendants to the plaintiff was the true mare Pentecost, and that, consequently, the plaintiff had no right of action against the defendants, as the damages recovered in the French courts against the plaintiff were not in consequence of any act done by him in pursuance of his employment by the defendants, but in consequence of the mistake made in the French courts as to the identity of the mare.—HALBRONN v. INTERNATIONAL HORSE AGENCY, K.B D., 622; [1903] 1 K. B. 270; 72 L. J. K. B. 90; 88 L. T. 232.

2. Fraud of agent—Sale of goods—Conduct of principal enabling agent to commit the fraud—Estoppel.—The appellants, who were timber merchants, instructed a dock company to honour transfers or delivery orders signed by their confidential clerk. The clerk by means of orders signed by him in fraud of the appellants had timber transferred into a fictitious name, and then sold and transferred the timber in this fictitious name to the respondents. In an action by the appellants against the respondents to recover damages for the conversion of the timber, Held, that the appellants were not precluded by their conduct from setting up the unauthorized action of their agent, for no representation was made by them or on their behalf to the respondents; also, that the goods were stolen by the clerk, therefore the respondents acquired no title to the timber and were consequently liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 49 W. R 673, [1901] 2 K. B. 697) reversed.—FARQUHARSON v. KING, H.L., 94; [1902] A. C. 325; 71 L. J. K. B. 667; 86 L. T. 810.

3 Partnership—Liability of firm for wrongful act of partner—Scope of authority—Act done in course of business—Illegal means—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 5, 10.—The defendant firm, which consisted of two partners, H. and S., carried on business as grain merchants, the whole management being under the control of H. It was in the course of the firm's business to obtain by legitimate means information as to contracts made by competitors in business. H. bribed a clerk of the plaintiff, who carried on a competing business, to give him access to the plaintiff's books, and thereby break his contract of service with the plaintiff. In an action to recover damages from the firm for the wrongful act of H.,

Held, that the firm was liable.—HAMLYN v. HOUSTON & CO., C A., 99; [1903] 1 K. B. 81; 72 L. J. K. B. 72; 87 L T. 500.

4. Power of attorney—Forged signature—Transfer of stock—Stockbroker—Warranty of authority—Liability—Indemnity.—Any person purporting to act as agent impliedly warrants the authority he professes to act under, so that, should the supposed authority turn out to be invalid or forged, he renders himself liable to make good the loss occasioned to those he has misled; and this is so even when he honestly believes his authority to be genuine. A stockbroker, therefore, executing a transfer of stock at the Bank of England under a forged power of attorney which he honestly believed to be good, must indemnify the bank for the consequential loss thereby occasioned them.

5. Secret commission — Custom. — If an agent conducts business in carrying out negotiations between his principal and a person whose interests are adverse to his principal, he cannot receive a commission from the person with whom he is negotiating without the knowledge of his principal, and any custom wide enough to cover such a case will not be upheld by the court.

Semble, that even in the case of a broker who merely introduces the vendor to the purchaser, such a custom could not be upheld.—BARTRAM v. LLOYD, K.B.D.; 88 L. T 286

6 Underwriter—Scope of authority—"For and on behalf" of principal—Contract for agent's sole interest—Liability of principal—Guarantee policy.—Where an agent who is authorized to make contracts "for and on behalf of" his principals makes a contract purporting on the face of it to be on behalf of the principals, which in fact is for his own interest and not for his principals, such contract is not, apart from holding out or ratification, binding upon the principals.—HAMBRO v. BURNAND, K.B.D., 652.

PROBATE:—

1. Citation—Administration, with will annexed—Specific legatee—Limited grant—Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77) s. 73 —The court, without requiring citation of next-of-kin, made a limited grant of administration, with will annexed, under section 73, to the sole beneficiary named in the will.

2. Codicil—Unattested document—Incorporation—Future document—Reference in will—No reference in codicil.—By her will a testatrix directed her trustees to give to such of her friends as might be named in a book of memorandum that would be found with her will the various articles specified in the same. At the time of the execution of the will there was no such book or memorandum in existence. Subsequently a memorandum book was drawn up which was in fact found with the will of the testatrix after her death. There was a codicil to the will, but no reference was contained in it to the memorandum book. The codicil was with the will and the memorandum book. The book was often referred to by the testatrix after she had executed her will and codicil.

Held, as the book was not in existence at the date of the execution of the will, and as no reference was made to it in the codicil, it could not be admitted to probate.—ANN CAROLINE SMART, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 238; 71 L. J. P. 123; 87 L. T. 142.

3. Foreign domicil—Administration—Will—Grant to foreign administrators—Executors passed over—Practice—Belgium.—The court will follow the grant of the foreign domicil, unless the administrators appointed by the foreign court are, by the law and practice of this country, personally disqualified from taking a grant here.

Thus, where a testator died domiciled in Belgium, leaving a will and codicil in English form appointing executors, and also leaving a Belgian will, the court made a grant of administration with all three documents annexed in favour of two persons who had been appointed administrators of the deceased's estate abroad, in accordance with the law of the domicil.—MEATYARD, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 125; 72 L. J. P. 25.

4 Foreign marriage—Validity—Domicil—Marriage ceremony performed by minister not of the same religious community as one of the contracting parties—Argentine Code.—A marriage between a member of the Church of England and an Episcocopalian Methodist is good according to Argentine law, although only celebrated once and at a Methodist Episcopal church by a minister who was not an ordained minister of the Church of England. —LIGHTBODY v. WEST, C.A.; 88 L. T. 484.

5. Fresh grant—Mistake of solicitor—Draft of will in possession of testatrix—Opportunity for reading over—Execution—Want of knowledge and approval—Elimination of words.—A solicitor received instructions from a testatrix as to her will, but mistook the extent of her interest in certain landed estates. The draft of the will was sent to the testatrix for her approval, retained by her for a considerable time, and then returned by her to the solicitor with certain alterations. In the draft the testatrix purported to devise "an undivided moiety of and in" certain estates, which was not the full extent of her interest. The will was duly executed containing these restrictive words. The court having found, as a fact, that, in spite of her retention of the draft and the alterations made therein, the testatrix did not know and approve of the restrictive clause as drawn, a fresh grant of probate of the will was decreed with the words "undivided moiety of and in" omitted.—BRISCO v. BAILLIE HAMILTON, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 234; 71 L. J. P. 121; 87 L. T. 746.

6 Lost will—Contents of draft—Codicil. — The court declined to grant probate of a draft will which was alleged to be incorporated in a subsequent codicil, or alternatively to the will itself, on the ground that it was not proved that at the time the codicil was executed there was any will in existence.

7. Mistake in will—Clerical error—Rectification—Striking out words.—When it is clear that a word has been inserted into a will by mistake in the process of copying, the court will cause such word to be struck out.—VAUGHAN v CLERK, P.D. & Ad.D.; 87 L. T. 144.

8. Sureties—Special circumstances — Sureties dispensed with—Administration.—While the court has no power to give leave to a proposed administratrix to carry on the deceased's business, it may, under special circumstances and for good cause shown, allow her a free hand in the administration, by dispensing with sureties to the administration bond, and by accepting the personal bond of the proposed administratrix for the administration of the estate according to law.—CORY, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 62; 72 L. J. P. 24; 88 L. T. 566.

9. Will—Nomination paper—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 39), s. 25, sub-sections 1, 2.—The court admitted as a valid will a nomination paper executed by a member of a co-operative society which was registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, although it was invalid as a nomination paper, because the deceased's credit with the society stood at a greater sum than £100, in contravention of section 25, sub-section 1, of the Act.—BAXTER, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D, 302; [1903] P. 12; 72 L. J. P. 2; 87 L. T. 748.

10. Will—Several sheets of paper—Destruction of two—Effect—Substitution of other sheets—Execution—Signatures—Clause of revocation—Intention—Intestacy.—A testator left a testamentary document in the form of a will, which was apparently duly executed, and consisted of five sheets of paper fastened together.

The fact was, however, that the first two sheets were executed in the year following the execution of the last three, and were not part of the document as originally executed. There was no evidence as to the contents of the two that were missing. The two that had been substituted contained the ordinary commencement, followed by a revocation clause, and were signed by the testator in the presence of the same two witnesses who had before attested the others.

Held, that the destruction of the first two sheets of the original will effected a revocation of the three that remained.

Held, further, that the signing by the testator of the two substituted sheets in the presence of the witnesses was not intended to make them operate as his will, and that the result was an intestacy.—LEONARD v. LEONARD, P.D. & Ad.D; [1902] P. 243; 71 L. J. P. 117; 87 L. J. 145.

PUBLIC HEALTH:—

1. Buildings—Building plans — Bye-laws—Repeal of by new bye-laws—Approval of plan under old bye-laws—Part of work carried out under old bye-laws—Right to complete work according to approved plan—"Work commenced" before date of new bye-laws.—Upon a summons against a builder for unlawfully erecting a building without complying with new bye-laws, the justices found that the building was not "work commenced" before the new bye-laws, and convicted the builder.

Held, that the approval of the plans of the building scheme and of the proposed terrace of houses and the carrying out of part of the work under the plans did not confer an absolute right to complete the work in accordance with the plans and bye-laws then in force, and did not entitle the builder to say that because some of the work had been commenced before the repeal of the bye-laws, a building commenced after such repeal was "work commenced" before such repeal, so as to exempt him from the operation of the new bye-laws; that the question whether work had been commenced or not within the meaning of the repealing bye-law is a question of fact for the justices, and that there was evidence before them upon which they could properly find that the building was not work commenced, and that the builder was properly convicted. —WHITE v. SUNDERLAND CORPORATION, K.B D.; 88 L. T. 592.

2. Building bye-laws—Repeal of by new bye-laws—Plan showing a number of houses—Deposit and approval of plan under old bye-laws—Commencement of part of the work after date of new bye-laws—Necessity for fresh deposit of plan—Commencement of the "work specified in such plan"—Estoppel.—Section 27 of the Harrogate Corporation Act, 1893, provided that the deposit with the corporation of any plan of any building should be null and void if "the execution of the work specified in such plan" should not be commenced within three years, and that a fresh deposit of plans should, unless the corporation should "otherwise determine," be requisite. In 1894 a builder deposited a plan in accordance with the building bye-laws then in force, showing thereon a number of houses proposed to be erected. Some of the houses were commenced within the three years from the deposit; two were both commenced and completed after the three years and a certificate given in respect of the same. In 1901 the old bye-laws were repealed by new bye-laws, except as to any work commenced before the date of the new bye-laws, or any work not so commenced but of which plans should have been approved before such date. After these new bye-laws came into force the builder commenced to erect a stable which was one of the buildings shown on the plan. The corporation objected on the ground that the plan did not comply with the new bye-laws.

Held, that the plan approved in 1894 was not one plan merely for the whole of the buildings shown thereon, but was really a number of separate plans for each building, and that if the work of any particular building shown on the plan were not commenced within the three years of the deposit of the plan, the deposit would with regard to such building be null and void under section 27; and consequently, that the particular portions of the work which were not commenced until after the date of the new bye-laws did not fall within either of the exceptions of the new bye-laws, and that the new bye-laws therefore applied to such portions of the work.

Held, further, that the fact that the corporation had without objection allowed two of the houses to be commenced and completed after the plan had become void by the lapse of the three years, and had given a certificate in respect thereof, did not create an estoppel against the corporation or show that they had "otherwise determined" that a fresh deposit of plans was not requisite.—MAYOR, &c., OF HARROGATE v. DICKINSON, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 299.

3. Nuisance—Overcrowding—Order to inspect—Evidence — Form of order — House — School. — "House" in section 91 of the Public Health Act, 1875, includes a day school. Where, under section 102, an application is made to a justice for an order to enter premises where a nuisance is alleged to to exist, such justice may consider whether there are reasonable grounds for suspecting there is a nuisance, and may receive evidence as to the true state of the facts. If a justice makes an order for the officer to enter to inspect such order ought to be made in reference to a particular subject-matter. —WIMBLEDON DISTRICT COUNCIL v. HASTINGS, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 118.

4. Nuisance—Power of local authority to enter premises—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 102, 306.—It is not competent for the representatives of a district council exercising powers with regard to nuisances under the Public Health Act, 1875, to enter upon premises and inspect them without first requesting the leave of the owner. They must apply for admission, and if they are refused, obtain an order to admit from the justices under section 102 of the Act.—CONSETT URBAN COUNCIL v. CRAWFORD, K.B.D., 669; [1902] 2 K. B. 183; 72 L. J. K. B. 571; 88 L. T. 836.

5. Sanitary authority—Sewer—Right to drain into sewer—Action for a declaration.—The owners of certain land of about 186 acres in extent proposed to lay it out as building land, and to erect a large number of houses thereon. They had a plan prepared showing sewers of different dimensions from 9in. to 18in. in diameter, and claimed that as owners of the premises they were entitled to connect their sewers with the sewer of the G. District Council, which was only 12in. in diameter. The G. District Council said that the construction of such a series of sewers was outside section 22 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that, if the owners insisted on arbitration, the G. District Council would raise this objection at every stage. A writ was then issued asking for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to connect their proposed sewers with the sewer of the defendants, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing the connection. The case came on upon a notice for trial without witnesses, but without any consent, and by agreement it was treated as a motion for judgment. The claim to an injunction was not argued.

Held, that, although there is jurisdiction under ord. 25, r. 5, to make a declaratory order, the jurisdiction is one to be exercised with extreme caution; that, as no portion of the estate had been built on and no drains or sewers constructed, it was inexpedient to make a declaration that the plaintiffs had a legal right to connect their sewers when made with that of the defendants.—FABER v. GOSWORTH URBAN COUNCIL, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 88 L. T. 549.

RAILWAY:—

1. "Accommodation works"—Level crossing—Extent of right of user—Grant of easement—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 16, 68-76.—A railway company's line severed an owner's land and crossed on the level a tram-line of the owner by which goods and traffic from the owner's land and coals from a colliery not on his land were conveyed to a neighbouring port. The railway company, when purchasing the premises, entered into an agreement, dated the 13th of March, 1868, with the owner that they would construct and maintain, "for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers for the time being of the lands adjoining the railway," certain works, including a level crossing for the tram-line. The defendant, the owner's successor in title, afterwards claimed to be entitled to convey over the level crossing goods and traffic brought on to her land from other places, whether situate on her estate or not.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to use the level crossing for the purpose of conveying goods and traffic so as substantially to increase the burden of the easement by altering or enlarging its character, nature, or extent as enjoyed at, or previously to, the date of the agreement of the 13th of March, 1868, or as since enjoyed by the defendant or her predecessors in title, if, owing to acquiescence or otherwise, such subsequent enjoyment was binding on the plaintiff company.

2. Carriage of merchandize—Rates—Sidings provided by trader—Rebate for station or service terminals—Jurisdiction of commissioners.—The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, by s. 4, provides that "whenever merchandize is received or delivered by a railway company at any siding or branch railway not belonging to the company, and a dispute arises between the railway company and the consignor or consignee of such merchandize as to any allowance or rebate to be made from the rates charged to such consignor or consignee in respect that the railway company does not provide station accommodation or perform terminal services, the Railway and Canal Commissioners shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such dispute, and to determine what, if any, is a reasonable and just allowance or rebate." The plaintiffs received from and delivered to the defendant company large quantities of merchandize at a siding belonging to the plaintiffs, in respect of which the company did not provide any station accommodation or perform any terminal services at that siding. They were charged the same rate as were charged to other traders for similar traffic, in respect of which the company did provide station accommodation and perform service terminals; and they claimed an allowance or rebate under section 4 of the Act. The Railway Commissioners decided that a rebate should be made. Sir Frederick Peel decided upon the ground that the rebate could be ordered, whether any charge for station or service terminals was in fact included in the rate or not; and Wright, J., expressed an opinion to the same effect. But Wright, J., and Lord Cobham both decided that a charge for station or service terminals was in fact included in the rate.

Held, that, as the majority of the commissioners had decided that the rebate should be made upon the ground that a charge for station or service terminals was in fact included in the rate, the appeal would not lie.—VICKERS, SONS, & MAXIM v. MIDLAND RAILWAY, C.A.; 87 L. T. 665.

3. Contract of carriage—Conveyance of goods by passenger train—Collection and delivery—Inclusive charge for carriage and collection of goods—Special Act—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 90.—A schedule of the statutory maximum rates and charges authorized to be taken by a railway company for the conveyance of goods contained a provision that the company should not be under obligation to carry non-perishable goods by passenger train. The company announced to the public their willingness to carry tailors' clothing by passenger train at a "collected and delivered" rate specified in a scale of charges which they published. The plaintiffs, who were common carriers at Bristol, sent parcels of tailors' clothing from Bristol to Southampton by the company's passenger train, having themselves collected the goods at Bristol and handed them over to the company at their passenger station. The plaintiffs paid to the company, under protest, the scale charge; and brought an action against them for money had and received, claiming to be entitled to a rebate from the defendants in respect of the collection of the goods at Bristol.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any rebate, and that the action was not maintainable.—STONE v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO., K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. B. 741; 72 L J. K. B. 377; 88 L. T. 92.

4. Exercise of statutory powers—Unreasonableness.—The defendants were authorized by statute to carry out certain works in connection with their undertaking, and were in the habit of carrying on work on the site of a proposed station by night as well as by day. The plaintiff, who occupied a house close to this site, brought an action to restrain the defendants from working at night, alleging that such work rendered his house uninhabitable, and was a vexatious and unreasonable abuse by the defendants of their statutory powers. He also claimed damages. This was a summons under ord. 25, r. 4, to strike out the plaintiff's statement of claim as disclosing no cause of action, on the ground that no action would lie for mere unreasonableness in the exercise of a statutory power. The court refused to hear the application in this form, stating that it was only to be used when actions were clearly frivolous and vexatious. By consent it was arranged to treat the summons as amended so as to be an application to try a preliminary point of law under ord. 25, r. 2.

Held, that, upon the assumption that working at night was unreasonable and rendered the plaintiff's house uninhabitable, a good cause of action was disclosed. The fact that compensation could be obtained under section 68 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, did not exclude the regulating and restraining jurisdiction of the court.—ROBERTS v. CHARING CROSS, EUSTON, AND HAMPSTEAD RAILWAY, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 87 L. T. 732.

5. Minerals under railway—Owner desiring to work minerals—Purchase and compensation—Act under which land purchased repealed by later Act—Saving by later Act of rights accrued under earlier Act.—When the surface of land has been sold under the provisions of a special Act which lays down certain terms with respect to the minerals and the purchase thereof, and that Act is repealed by a later statute which enacts a different set of conditions less favourable to the surface owner in respect of the minerals, but also provides that the repeal is not to annul or prejudice any purchase or sale made under the earlier statute, the rights and obligations of the parties with respect to the sale of the minerals or compensation for the same are regulated by the earlier and not by the later legislation.—LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY v. WALKER, H.L.: [1903] A. C. 289; 72 L. J. K. B. 578; 88 L. T. 705.

6. Negligence—Train in motion—Shutting door without notice—Injury to passenger.—B., being a passenger from D. to U., at L., some people getting into the carriage, he put his hand in the doorway. While the train was moving, the door was banged to by a servant of the defendant company without any notice or warning, and B.'s hand was injured.

Held, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the company.—BENSON v. FURNESS RAILWAY CO., K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 268.

7. Passenger—Fare—Travelling beyond station to which ticket is taken—Fare for whole distance more than sum of intermediate fares—Right of company to charge difference between fare paid and the through fare.—The defendant, who intended to travel from Huddersfield to Manchester, took a ticket only to Stalybridge, an intermediate station. The fare from Huddersfield to Manchester was 2s. 3d., and to Stalybridge 1s. 6d., and the fare from Stalybridge to Manchester 7d. At Stalybridge the collector took defendant's ticket and demanded 9d., being the difference between the fare which the defendant had paid and the through fare from Huddersfield to Manchester. This the defendant refused to pay, but tendered 7d., the local fare between Stalybridge and Manchester. This was not accepted, but he was permitted to proceed by the same train to Manchester. By the regulations printed in the company's time-tables a passenger using a ticket for any other station than that for which it was issued was liable to pay the difference between the sum actually paid and the fare between the stations from and to which he travelled; and passengers could not re-book at an intermediate station by the same train. In an action by the company to recover 9d.,

Held, that the conditions were part of the contract, and the defendant was bound to pay the difference between the sum he had paid and the through fare from Huddersfield to Manchester.—LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY v. HINCHCLIFFE, K.B.D., 556; [1903] 2 K. RATING:—

1. Appeal from special sessions—Jurisdiction of quarter sessions over costs before special sessions—Poor rate—Parochial Assessments Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), s. 6.—Where, upon an appeal from special sessions under section 6 of the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, the quarter sessions allow the appeal, the quarter sessions have jurisdiction to set aside the order of the special sessions, giving costs to the successful party at the special sessions, and also to order that the unsuccessful party at the special sessions shall be paid the costs incurred by him at the special sessions.—REX v. CORNWALL JUSTICES, K.B.D.; [1903] 2 K. B. 178; 72 L. J. K. B. 622; 88 L. T. 775.

2. Lease of tolls—Occupation of bridge—Liability of lessee.—By a lease the Y. Corporation demised to P. for three years, in consideration of a yearly rent, the tolls and toll-house of the S. bridge. There were certain reservations in favour of the corporation, and P. covenanted to pay the rent, rates, and taxes in respect of the bridge, toll-house, &c.—PERCY v. HALL, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 830.

3. Occupation—General district rate—Exemption on ground of non-occupation—House used in summer months—Furniture removed during winter months—Fittings left in house—Intention of returning to house.—The respondent took a lease of a house and furnished it for the purpose of receiving boarders. She did not reside in the house, and in December, 1900, she removed from the house all her furniture and effects, except certain fixtures, fittings, and things which she had hired from the previous tenant. She intended to return to the house in the following summer, and in May she returned and refurnished the house, but, with the exception of the fittings and things left therein, the house was empty from December, 1900, to May, 1901. The respondent claimed exemption from a general district rate for the period from December, 1900, to May, 1901, on the ground that during that period the house was "unoccupied" within the meaning of section 211, sub-section 2, of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held, that the proper inference of law was that the respondent had the beneficial occupation of the house during the whole of the period, and was therefore not entitled to the exemption in section 211, sub-section 2, of the Act in favour of unoccupied premises, but was liable to the rate for the whole period.—GAGE v. WREN, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 271.

4. Poor rate—Canal—No beneficial occupation.—By an Act of George III. the appellants were authorized to make a canal and they were to be rated in respect of the lands taken in pursuance of the Act in the same proportion as other lands lying near were or should be rated and as they would be rateable in case the same were the property of individuals in their natural capacity. Coal being worked near a portion of the canal, it began to subside and had to be closed and could not be used.

Held, that this portion was rateable as if it were open for canal traffic and in fact being so used.—GLAMORGANSHIRE CANAL CO. v. MERTHYR TYDFIL UNION, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 85.

5. Poor rate—Exemption—Premises used for Crown purposes—Police residence with cell.—Certain premises were formerly the lodge of an old prison now pulled down. They were occupied by two members of the county constabulary, and were formerly used as a police station with two cells. The premises are now used for the residence of two constables and their families, and one of the cells is still retained for the detention of prisoners. A certain weekly sum is deducted from the pay of the constables as rent in respect of their occupation of part of the premises. No police books are kept there, and charges are not taken there. The whole of the premises are subject to the inspection of the Government inspector of police, but no inspection had been made for six years, though they were yearly inspected by the county surveyor.

Held, that the premises were not exempt from the poor rate, as being used for police purposes.—MONMOUTH OVERSEERS v. MONMOUTHSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 65.

SALE OF GOODS:—

1. Implied warranty—Sale of specific chattel—Sale for "particular purpose"—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 14, sub-section 1.—The plaintiff, who was a draper, went to the shop of the defendant, who was a chemist, and asked him for an indiarubber hot-water bottle for the use of his wife, who was suffering from cramp. The defendant, who did not himself manufacture hot-water bottles, showed the plaintiff a bottle, and upon being asked whether it would stand boiling water, he said that it would not, but that it would stand hot water. The plaintiff bought the bottle, and while his wife was using it it burst and scalded her. In an action to recover damages for breach of warranty, the jury found that the bottle when sold was not fit for use as a hot-water bottle, and that this was the cause of its bursting.

Held, by Walton, J., and the Court of Appeal, that there was an implied warranty that the bottle was fit for the particular purpose for which it was required within section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the purchaser having in the circumstances made known that purpose to the seller, so as to show that he relied on the seller's skill or judgment.—PREIST v. LAST, C.A., 678; [1903] 2 K. B. 148.

2. Negligence—Dangerous goods—Knowledge of vendor—Duty of vendor to purchaser—Warranty of fitness—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 14.—Where the vendor of a tin containing disinfectant powder knew that it was likely to cause danger to a person opening it, unless special care was taken, and the danger was not such as presumably would be known to or appreciable by the purchaser, unless warned of it, Held, that, independently of any warranty, there was cast upon the vendor a duty to warn the purchaser of the danger.

Where one of the rules of a co-operative society stated that no warranties were given with goods sold by the society, except on the written authority of one of the managing directors or the assistant manager,

3. Warranty—Implied warranty—Purchase by description—Merchantable quality—Sale of beer by retail in public-house—Purchase in reliance on good name of particular beer—Beer containing arsenic—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 14, sub-section 2.—The plaintiff was in the habit of drinking beer in the defendant's public-house, where H.'s beer was sold exclusively. Having been poisoned by arsenic contained in the beer, he brought an action for breach of an implied warranty on the sale of the beer that it was fit to drink. The jury found that the plaintiff did not buy the beer in reliance on the skill or judgment of the defendant, but because he preferred that particular beer and in reliance on the good name of H.'s beer.

Held, that, though there was no implied warranty under sub-section 1 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, there was an implied warranty under sub-section 2 that the beer was of merchantable quality; for on the finding of the jury the sale of the beer must be taken to have been a sale by description.—WREN v. HOLT, C.A., 435; [1903] 1 K. The establishment of such centres amounts to the establishment of non-elementary schools, and falls within the decision in Rex v. Cockerton, 49 W. R. 433, [1901] 1 K. B. 726.—DYER v. LONDON SCHOOL BOARD, C.A., 34; [1902] 2 Ch. 768; 72 L. J. Ch. 10; 87 L. T. 225.

SCOTLAND, LAW of:—

Feu-contract—Construction—Stipulation for additional rent for ground "on which buildings shall be erected."—Land, which then consisted of a mansion-house and grounds, was let upon a contract by which a feu-duty (or rent) of £5 an acre was reserved, and, it being in the contemplation of the parties that the land might eventually come to be used as building land, a provision was inserted for an additional duty "for every square pole of the said piece of ground on which buildings shall be erected," with an exception in the case of additions to the mansion-house, or the building of a lodge. Other buildings were afterwards erected on the land.

Held, that the additional duty was only payable for land on which buildings were actually erected, and not for land accessory to such buildings, though it might be incapable of separate occupation. —MCFARLANE v. STIRLING-MAXWELL, H.L.; 87 L. T. 554.

SEQUESTRATION:—

Practice—Chose in action—Banker—Customer—Dealings with customer's account after notice of writ of sequestration against customer.—Mere notice of a writ of sequestration does not bind a chose in action in the hands of a third party.

A defendant in an administration action was ordered to pay a sum of £136 odd into court to the credit of the action. Failing to do so, a writ of sequestration was issued against him on the 20th of May, 1902. The sequestrators attended at the defendant's bank on the same day and gave notice of the writ, and demanded payment to themselves of the amount (which consisted of £204 odd) standing to defendant's credit at that date. The bank undertook not to deal with defendant's account pending consultation with their solicitors. Notwithstanding the undertaking, the defendant was permitted to draw on his account, and on the 22nd of May his balance was reduced to £137 odd. On the 22nd of May the sequestrators gave formal notice in writing of the writ to the bank, and took out a summons asking that the bank might be ordered to pay to them the amount standing to the defendant's credit in the books of the bank on the 20th of May, 1902.

Held, that an order could not be made for the full sum of £204 standing to defendant's credit at the bank on the 20th of May, but an order was made, without costs, for the amount standing to defendant's credit at the bank on the 22nd of May, 1902.—POLLARD, RE, POLLARD v. POLLARD, *Ch.D. 3. Compound settlement—Appointment of trustees —Solicitor for tenant for life as trustee of settlement —Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, sub-sections 1, 8; s. 38.—The trustees of a compound settlement cannot be validly appointed, under section 2 (8) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, trustees, for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, by a declaration to that effect contained in a document forming one of the documents composing the compound settlement, to which document some of the beneficiaries interested under the settlement are not parties nor bound by its provisions; and consequently, notwithstanding such declarations, trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts would have to be appointed by the court.

The general rule that the court will not appoint the solicitor of the tenant for life a trustee of the settlement will only be departed from when it can be shown that his appointment will be more beneficial than that of any other person.

The rule laid down in In re Kemp's Settled Estates, 31 W. R 930, 24 Ch. D. 485, followed.—SPENSER'S SETTLED ESTATES, RE, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 262; [1903] 1 Ch. 75; 72 L. J. Ch. 59; 88 L. T. 158.

In 1872 A. by deed charged the lands with a jointure for his wife. In 1895 A. and B. by a disentailing assurance conveyed the lands to such uses as A. and B. should jointly appoint, and by a deed of resettlement of even date they appointed the lands to the use of A. for life "in restoration and continuance of his former life estate under the will," with remainder to B. in fee; and by this deed of resettlement persons were appointed to be trustees of the deed of resettlement, and were also thereby expressed to be appointed trustees thereof "for all the purposes of the Settled Land Acts." A. contracted to sell the lands as tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts. Upon objection taken by the purchaser,

Held, that the only settlement under which A. could exercise the statutory power of sale under the Settled Land Acts was the "compound settlement," consisting of the will, the jointure deed, the disentailing deed, and the deed of resettlement; that no trustees of such compound settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts in fact existed; and that unless and until such trustees were appointed or a consent given to have the purchase-money paid into court, the vendor could not make a good title to the purchaser.—CORNWALLIS-WEST AND MUNRO'S CONTRACT, RE, *Ch.D. Held, that as the annuitants for the time being were, between them, entitled to the entire rents and profits of the residuary real estate, they were persons having together the powers of a tenant for life under section 58 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.—BENNET, RE, BENNET v. BENNET, *Ch.D. 8. Tenant for life—"Opened" mines—Colliery—Seams of coal not actually worked—"Mineral estate"—Intention of settlor.—A testator who died in June, 1897, devised all his real estate to the use of his trustees in trust for the plaintiff for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to each of his brothers in seniority for life and their sons successively in tail male, with remainder to his own right heirs for ever. The testator gave his personal estate to other persons. The testator expressly empowered his trustees at their discretion to carry on so long as they should think proper his mining, manufacturing, and other businesses, and to increase or diminish any such businesses or his capital therein, or otherwise to deal with and manage the same as they in their absolute discretion should think proper. The will did not exempt the persons thereby made tenants for life of the real estate of the testator from impeachment for waste. Part of the real estate was the freehold portion of a mining estate known as the S. Colliery. The testator purchased that property, which was in part leasehold, in 1894 as a going concern. The colliery was being worked when the testator purchased it. The coal and ironstone therein lay in eight seams. Two of the seams had not been actually worked, though a cross-heading passed through one of them. The testator, since he purchased the property, had expended a large sum in providing new machinery, and had put working capital to a larger amount into the business. The question was, whether the plaintiff was entitled, as tenant for life under the will, to work for his own benefit all seams of coal and ironstone comprised in the freehold portion of the colliery.

Held, that the whole course of dealing with the property indicated an intention on the part of the owner to treat all the seams as mines which were opened; that, therefore, all the eight seams of coal, including the two which had not been actually worked, were to be treated as opened at the time of the testator's death; that this view was confirmed by the words of the will, which not only showed that all the seams were treated as one commercial entity, but also got over the difficulty arising from the fact that the freehold and leasehold parts were differently dealt with in the will, a conclusion which was fortified by the powers thereby conferred on the trustees.—CHAYTOR v. TROTTER, C.A.; 87 L. 9. Trustees with power to manage and to appoint and pay servants—Trust to permit A. to reside—Tenant for life—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s 2, sub-section 5; s. 58, sub-section 1 (ix.).—A testatrix devised certain mansion-houses to trustees, and directed them to permit A. at any time and from time to time during her life to reside therein. The trustees were directed to keep the mansion-houses in a fit state for residence, and for this purpose to appoint and pay servants, who were to be Protestants and Welsh-speaking.

Held, that A. had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts.

SETTLEMENT:—

1. Marriage settlement—Construction—Children—Wife's next-of-kin—Words "died intestate and without ever having been married."—By a marriage settlement the trust property was settled, in default of children attaining a vested interest and in default of appointment, for such person or persons of the blood and kindred of H. S. as under the statute for the distribution of the estates of intestates would have been the next-of-kin of the said H. S. in case she had died intestate and without ever having been married.

Held, on the construction of the settlement, that the issue of the marriage were excluded by the words "without ever having been married."—SMITH, RE, WILKINS v. SMITH, Swinfen Eady, J. 217; [1903] 1 Ch. 373; 72 L. J. Ch. 184; 87 L. T. 740.

2. Marriage settlement—Trust for persons who would have been entitled as wife's next-of-kin if wife had survived husband—Survivorship of husband—Time for ascertaining next-of-kin.—Under the ultimate trust in a marriage settlement trustees were directed to hold certain funds "in trust for the person or persons who, under the statutes made negligence, fault, or error of judgment on the part of the pilot, captain, sailors, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the vessel, or otherwise."

Held, that the shipowners were not liable for damages done to the goods, as the word "otherwise" referred, not to the "management or navigation of the vessel," but to the receiving and delivery of the cargo, and that although the damage was due to the negligence of the stevedores in the discharge of the cargo, it was an "accident" within the meaning of the clause, as the negligence was not wilful.—"TORBRYAN," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 35; 72 L. J. P. 14; 87 L. T. 656.

9. Charter-party—Demurrage—Load as customary always afloat—Draught insufficient to complete loading—Obstacles to loading caused by charterer—Lay days.—By a charter-party a ship was to proceed to B. or as near thereto as she could safely get, and there load as customary, always afloat, at such wharf, jetty, or anchorage as the charterers' agent might direct, a certain cargo. Owing to her draught the ship could not have loaded fully at the berth at the jetty, but according to the custom of the port she would be moved when partly loaded from the jetty to an anchorage to complete loading.

Held, that the lay days did not begin to run until the ship was at the jetty or anchorage the charterers' agent directed, and that the fact that she could not fully load there made no difference and did not prevent the charterers requiring her to come to the jetty and claiming that the lay days did not commence until she was at the jetty. If a ship is prevented from going to the loading place which the charterer has a right to name by obstacles caused by the charterer or in consequence of the engagements of the charterer, the lay days commence to count as soon as the ship is ready to load and would but for such obstacles and engagements begin to load at such place.—AKTIESELSKABET INGLEWOOD v. MILLAR'S KARRI AND JARRAH FORESTS (LIMITED), K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 559.

10. Charter-party—Discharge of cargo—Demurrage—"As fast as steamer can deliver"—"According to custom of port."—By charter-party it was agreed that a steamer should proceed to a named port, and there deliver a cargo of timber "to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver . . . according to the custom of the port," with an exception in respect of delay caused by a strike or lock-out.

The ship duly arrived at the port, and was ready to deliver the cargo, but delivery was delayed by the crowded state of the dock to which she was ordered. There was evidence that she could not have been discharged more quickly, under the circumstances, elsewhere in the port, and that the consignees had used all reasonable means to procure the discharge.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that they had performed their obligation under the charter-party, and were not liable for demurrage.—HULTHEN v. STEWART, H.L.; 88 L. T. 702.

11. Charter-party — Exceptions — Fire — Applicability to charterer.—The exception of fire in a charter-party enures for the protection of the charterer as well as the shipowner.—NEWMAN & DALE STEAMSHIP CO. AND BRITISH, &c., CO., RE, K.B.D.; [1903] 1 K. B. 262; 72 L. J. K. B. 110; 87 L. T. 614.

12. Charter-party—Freight—Lien of shipowner on sub-freight.—A lien on sub-freight given by a charter-party to a shipowner as security for the payment to him of the hire of the ship can only be exercised before such sub-freight has been paid to the charterer or his agent. and, therefore, when once the sub-freight has been so paid the shipowner has no right, by virtue of his lien, to follow the sub-freight.—TAGART, BEATON, & CO. v. FISHER, C.A., 599; [1903] 1 K. B. 391; 72 L. J. K. B. 202; 88 L. T. 451.

13. Charter-party—Freight—Option to pay freight on weight delivered or intake weight—Time to exercise option.—By the terms of a charter-party cargo was to be delivered "on payment of freight at the rate of 6s. 3d. per ton delivered or intake weight less 2 per cent. at charterers' option." The shipowners not having required the charterers to declare their option as soon as the cargo was delivered, the latter elected to pay on the intake weight less 2 per cent.

Held, that the charterers could elect to pay the lesser—i.e., the intake freight, as they were not bound to exercise their option until the time for payment of the freight had arrived, the shipowners having waived their right to require the charterers to declare their option as soon as the cargo had been delivered.—"DOWLAIS," THE, C.A., 88

14. Charter-party—Seaworthiness—Insufficiency of coal—Charterers to provide coal.—A charter-party for a round voyage was made subject to conditions, one of which was that the charterers should provide and pay for all coal. The vessel started on one of the stages of the voyage with an insufficient quantity of coal on board, whereby she was rendered unseaworthy. The insufficiency resulted not from any failure on the part of the charterers to supply coal required by the captain, but from failure on the part of the chief engineer to estimate correctly the quantity of coal in the ship's bunkers when she started. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners to recover damages for breach of warranty of seaworthiness,

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, because the above condition did not relieve the shipowners from their obligation to take care that the vessel had sufficient coal on board by placing the question of the supply of coal in the discretion of the charterers; and, secondly, because, even if the charterers had any discretion in the matter, they were prevented from exercising it properly by the default of the defendants' servants.—MOLIVER & CO. v. TATE STEAMERS, C.A., 393; [1903] 1 K. B. 362; 72 L. J. K B. 253; 88 L. T. 182.

15. Collision—Article 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897.—Under article 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, the duty imposed on steam vessels which are in sight of one another under way, of indicating by signals on the whistle any course which a vessel intends to take, such course being authorized or required by the rules, is not limited to the case of vessels in narrow waters, but the word "authorized" is to be widely interpreted.—"USKMOOR," THE, P.D. & Ad.D., 93; [1902] P. 250; 71 L. J. P. 103; 87 L. T. 55.

16. Collision—Assessment of damage—Value of vessel where no market value.—Where a vessel has been totally lost and there is no market value for her at the time immediately preceding her loss, the real test as to what she was worth is, What was her value to her owners as a going concern at the time she was lost?—"HARMONIDES," THE, P.D. & Ad.D., 303; [1903] P. 1; 72 L. J. P. 9; 87 L. T. 448.

17. Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Belgian law.

—Article 228 of the Code de Commerce, Livre II., Titre VIII., De L'Abordage, enacts that "if the collision be caused by the default of any person, all the damages are borne by the ship on board of which the default has been committed. The presence of a pilot on board is no defence to this liability." The court construed that to mean that, whether the pilot is on board or not, it makes no difference as to the responsibility of the owners if damage is caused in consequence of the negligence of those in charge of the ship.—"DALLINGTON," THE P.D. & Ad.D., 607; [1903] P. 77; 72 L. J. P. 17; 88 L. T. 128.

18. Collision—Fog—Fog signal forward of beam—Duty to stop engines—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, art. 16—Statutory presumption of fault—Foreign vessel outside limits of territorial jurisdiction—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 419, sub-section 4; s. 424.—A British and a Dutch steam vessel came into collision, during a dense fog, in the English Channel six miles off Dungeness. The owners of the British vessel admitted liability for an infringement of the collision regulations; but the owners of the Dutch vessel denied liability on the ground, inter alia, that though the whistle of the other vessel was heard forward of the beam, their vessel was going so slow, and the fog signal so far off, that their master thought it better to wait, before stopping his engines, until he heard the whistle again.

Held, by Bucknill, J., that the Dutch vessel was to blame for not stopping, which omission in fact contributed to the collision, and no circumstance had been shown for disobeying the positive direction contained in the second paragraph of article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, that "a steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines . . ."—"KONING WILLEM I.," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 114; 72 L.J. P. 28; 88 L. T. 807.

19. Collision—Fog—Moderate speed.—The power of stopping in a short space is one of the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in deciding whether a vessel is proceeding at a moderate speed or not; but article 15 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is imperative, and therefore if the court is of opinion that in fact a vessel was not going at a moderate speed in a fog under the existing circumstances, the fact that she could stop very quickly, or that a slower rate of speed would lead to unhandiness or loss of position, will not exempt her from liability should a collision occur.—OCEANIC STEAM NAVIGATION CO. v WATERFORD STEAMSHIP CO., H.L.; 88 L. T 303.

20. Collision—Negligence—Contributory negligence.—The steamship F., proceeding down the River Thames, against the tide, committed a breach of bye-law 47 of the Thames Bye-laws in neglecting to wait at B. point until the steamship O. G., which was coming up with the tide, and which at the time was turning in the river preparatory to entering the West India Dock, had passed clear. A collision occurred.

Held, that although The O. G. was to blame for not keeping a proper look-out, and conducting the turning without proper care, The F. was also to blame for hindering the manœuvres of The O. G. by not obeying the rule, and so contributing to the collision.—"OVINGDEAN GRANGE," THE, C.A.; [1902] P. 208; 71 L. J. P. 105; 87 L. T. 15.

21. General average loss—General average adjusters—Loss of time freight.—The words "all loss" in the well-known passage in Lawrance, J.'s, judgment in Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East 220, at p. 228, relating to a general average sacrifice, ought not to be extended so as to include losses which are the result of accidental circumstances affecting the loser, and are not losses which the other persons interested ought in ordinary course to be treated as concerned with.

The practice of general average adjusters of not allowing in general average, loss of time freight which is the result of detention for repair of damage caused by a general average sacrifice is in accordance with legal principles, and is rightly left out of consideration.—"LEITRIM," THE, P.D. & Ad.D., 158; [1902] P. 256; 71 L. J. P. 108; 87 L. T. 240.

22. Loading coal—Trimming charges—Self-trimmer—Jurisdiction of Trimming Committee.—Held, that the Trimming Committee at Cardiff had jurisdiction to decide that a ship was a self-trimmer, and that their decision was final.—"SWINDON," THE, C.A., 119.

23. Mortgage—Action in foreign country—Staying proceedings in this country for declaration as to priorities—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, r. 5.—On default being made under a mortgage of a British ship, the mortgagees, the plaintiffs, took possession and chartered her to a port in France, where she and her freight were arrested by the defendants, who were British subjects and who claimed for necessaries supplied the ship, and judgment by default being obtained in England was made "executory" in France. The mortgagees intervened in France, and also commenced separate actions against them and against the mortgagors asking for judgment, declaring that they, as mortgagees in possession, were entitled to the ship and her freight in priority to the mortgagors and to the defendant's claiming for necessaries.

The Court held that the action against the defendants, who claimed for necessaries, was not vexatious, and ought not to be stayed; but that the action against the mortgagors ought to be stayed.

Brooking v. Maudslay, Son, & Field, 36 W. R. 664, 38 Ch. D. 636, followed.—"MANAR," THE, P.D. & Ad.D, 687; [1903] P. 95; 72 L. J. P. 41.

24. Mortgage—Assignment of freight—Freight due and payable before possession taken—Interpleader.—Balance of freight was earned and became due and payable on the 17th of June, 1902, in respect of a cargo carried by a vessel. The sum so due was assigned by the shipowners to the plaintiff. The defendants, who were mortgagees of the vessel under a mortgage deed dated the 11th of October, 1900, took possession of the vessel on the 14th of August, 1902. The freight, which had become due on the 17th of June, 1902, remained unpaid at the date when the defendants, as mortgagees, took possession of the vessel.

Held, that as the freight became due and payable before the defendants, as mortgagees, took possession, the plaintiffs were entitled to the sum so due.—SHILLITO v BIGGART, K.B.D., 479; [1903] 1 K. B. 683; 72 L. J. K. B. 294; 88 L. T. 426.

25. Mortgage—Shares in ship—Agent receiving profit—Notice by mortgagee—Periodical distributions of profits by agent.—E. was the mortgagee of certain shares in two ships. The profits were received by Messrs. B., A., & Co., who made periodical distributions, once a year in March, amongst the persons entitled. E. gave notice in November of the mortgage.

Held, that E. was only entitled to the freight earned and received by Messrs. B., A., & Co. after the notice, and that before that date the mortgagor was entitled, as the fact that the agents only accounted to the persons entitled at stated periods made no difference.—ESSARTS v. WHINNEY, C.A.; 88 L. T. 191.

26. Negligence—Damage to vessel lying in berth—Liability of wharf owners.—The plaintiffs' vessel, which was found to be in a fit condition to take the ground for the purpose of unloading a cargo of iron ore, was damaged through straining, by reason of her lying on an uneven bottom in the defendant's wharf.

The Court held the defendants to blame in not keeping the berth in a fit and proper condition to receive the vessel, and held the plaintiffs entitled to recover such damages as were assessed by the registrar and merchants—"VILLE DE ST. NAZAIRE," THE, P.D. & Ad.D., 590.

27. Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Collision outside territorial waters—Action against owners of English tug and foreign tow—Proper party—Action properly brought—Ord. 11, r. 1 (g).—A collision occurred outside British territorial waters between an English steamship and a French sailing ship which was in tow of an English tug. The owners of the French ship commenced an action against the owners of the English steamer in the French court. The owners of the English steamer then commenced an action in personam in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the French ship and the owners of the tug, and, having served the writ on the owners of the tug, obtained leave to issue a concurrent writ and serve notice thereof on the owners of the French ship out of the jurisdiction. The owners of the French ship, after obtaining judgment by default in the French action, and compelling the owners of the English steamer to give security in the nature of bail in order to avoid the arrest of their vessel, took out a summons asking that the order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction might be discharged.

Held, that the order ought not to be discharged, for the action was properly brought against the owners of the tug as well as against the owners of the tow, and the owners of the tow were proper parties to the action; and the order was not the less rightly made because the cause of action arose out of the jurisdiction.

Decision of Barnes, J. (ante, p. 271), affirmed.—"DUC D'AUMALE," THE, C.A., 332; [1903] P. 18; 72 L. J. P. 11; 87 L. T. 674.

28. Salvage—Constructive acceptance of service.—The defendants' barque, with three tugs in attendance, was lying moored outside the entrance to the Alexandra Dock at Hull waiting to enter, when a steamer coming out of the dock, owing to a rope fouling her propeller, was driven by wind and tide down on to the barque, which in turn was forced on to the Hebbles Sand. The two tugs in attendance on the steamer towed that vessel clear of the barque, and thereby the three tugs in attendance on the barque were enabled to pull that vessel off the sand. In a salvage suit commenced by the five tugs against the owners of the barque,

Held, by Bucknill, J., that the three tugs which were in attendance on the barque were entitled to salvage, as their services, for the time being, were outside their towage contract, but that the claim against the barque made by the two tugs in attendance on the steamer must be disallowed, as there was no evidence from which a constructive acceptance of their services by the master of the barque could be inferred within the principle laid down in The Vandyck, 5 Asp. M. L. C. 17.—"EMILIE GALLINE," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 106; 72 L. J. P. 39; 88 L. T. 743.

29. Salvage—Extortionate agreement.—A sailing vessel dragged her anchors in a gale of wind towards another vessel. In answer to signals made by the former vessel a tug came out, but her master refused to put a rope on board unless paid £1,000. This sum the master eventually agreed to give, and the vessel was towed away. In an action brought by the tug against both sailing ships, claiming £1,000 against one and salvage against the other,

Held, in the one case, that the agreement must be set aside as inequitable, and £200 was awarded to the plaintiffs, and in the other that the action must be dismissed.—"PORT CALEDONIA" THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 184; 72 L. J. P. 60.

30. Salvage—Information by one person leading to a salvage service by another person—Lifeboat crew.—The coxswain of a lifeboat, whilst endeavouring with his crew to put off to a vessel in distress, sent a telegram for the assistance of tugs. The owners of the tugs had, however, previously heard of the position of the vessel, and were already despatching their tugs. In an action of salvage,

Held, by Bucknill, J., that, though a person may hold the position of a salvor who does nothing more than give information, outside his duty, of such a nature as to be the cause of acts subsequently done by others which are salvage services, the claim in the present case failed, as the telegram sent by the coxswain of the lifeboat was not in fact the cause of the tugs going out to the rescue of the vessel.

The onus is upon the crew of a lifeboat, going out to save life, to shew that they have rendered services entitling them to be regarded as property salvors.—"MARGUERITE MOLINOS," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 160; 72 L. J P. 56.

31. Salvage—Standing by—Attempting to tow—Services rendered at request—Principles upon which awards made.—A steamship, valued at £27,000, from Philadelphia to Bremen, with a part cargo of petroleum, belonging to the owners of the steamship, of the value of £7,578, the rest naphtha valued at £7,000, and freight at risk £1,743, became disabled so that she could not steer when about 1,000 miles from Falmouth. After making some progress to the eastward, she was fallen in with by steamship No. 1, the master of which agreed to attempt to get her to Fayal; but, owing to very bad weather, after standing by and steering her for a few miles, he left the disabled vessel. She was then picked up by steamship No. 2, and towed 265 miles, when, owing to damage to the machinery of the salving vessel and the hawser parting, the disabled steamer was lost sight of. Steamship No. 3 then came up; but after a difficult towage of about twelve miles, left her owing to being short of feed for the horses she was carrying. Steamship No. 4 then established communication with her, and towed her 468 miles to Falmouth, being accompanied by steamship No. 5, which belonged to the same owners as the disabled vessel, and acted as a standby in case of emergency. In consolidated actions of salvage by the owners, masters, and crews of the five steamships,

Held, by Bucknill, J., that steamship No. 1 was entitled to £800 by way of payment for work done in standing by and, at request, attempting to tow within the principle laid down in The Benlarig (1888) 14 P. D. 3; that steamship No. 2 was entitled to a salvage award of £2,500 for having, within the principle laid down in The Atlas, (1862) Lush. 518, and The Camellia, (1883) 9 P. D. 27, meritoriously contributed to the ultimate safety of the disabled vessel, the award being fixed at a lower standard than that to which the principal salvor was entitled, as the part taken by this salvor by itself would not have produced the successful result; that steamship No. 3 was, on similar grounds, and as having brought the disabled steamer within sight of the principal salvor, entitled to an award of £800; that steamship No. 4, having towed the disabled steamer into a port of safety, was entitled, as the principal salvor, to an award of £4,000; whilst the owners of steamship No. 5 were entitled, as against the naphtha cargo, to an award of £300, and her master and crew, as against ship, cargo, and freight, to an award of £150, making a total of £8,550.—"AUGUST KORFF," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 166; 72 L. J. P. 53.

32. Seaman—"Distressed seaman" — "Sufficient evidence"—Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44).—The owners of a vessel which had been wrecked paid the shipwrecked crew the balance of wages due to them. Some of the crew were maintained and provided with a passage to the United Kingdom by the Governor of South Australia, acting by the Marine Board of South Australia, on behalf of the Crown. The wages paid were in excess of the expense thus incurred.

The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 193, sued the shipowners to recover the expenses so incurred.

Held, that such seamen were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 and 1898, and that the possession of wages was immaterial; "sufficient evidence" in section 193, sub-section 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, means conclusive evidence.—BOARD OF TRADE v. SAILING SHIP GLENPARK, K.B.D., 554; 88 L. T. 693.

33. Seaman—Injury in service of ship—Medical expenses after being brought back to home port—Liability of shipowner—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 207, sub section 1.—By section 207, sub-section 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, "If the master of, or a seaman or apprentice belonging to, a ship receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine, and also the expenses of the maintenance of the master, seaman, or apprentice until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back, if shipped in the United Kingdom, to a port of the United Kingdom, or if shipped in a British possession to a port of that possession, and of his conveyance to the port, and in case of death the expense (if any) of his burial, shall be defrayed by the owner of the ship, without any deduction on that account from his wages."

Held, that the words "until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back," qualify the liability of the shipowner to pay the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine for the injured seaman as well as the expenses of his maintenance, and that therefore the shipowner's liability in respect of both ceases upon the injured seaman being brought back to a home port.—ANDERSON v. RAYNER, C.A., 369; [1903] 1 K. B. 589; 72 L. J. K. B. 292; 88 L. T. 313.

34. Wages—Victualling allowance—Maritime lien—Shipwrights — Possessory lien — Priorities.—An allowance of money made to the crew of a vessel in consideration of their finding their own provisions is part of their wages, and they have a maritime lien in respect of it. The maritime lien of the crew for their wages takes priority of the possessory lien of shipwrights up to the time when the vessel is put into the hands of the shipwrights for repairs, and the fact of the master and crew being on board the vessel while repairs are being done does not oust the possessory lien of the shipwrights. Where a contract has been entered into to do certain repairs the repairers have a possessory lien for the work they have done, although they have not completed all the repairs they contracted to do.—"TERGESTE," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 26; 72 L. J. P. 18; 87 L. T. 567.

35. Wages and disbursements — Foreign ship — Maritime lien—Lex fori—Priorities.—In an action by the master of a ship for wages and disbursements, lex fori applies and not the lex loci contractus, and a foreign master has a maritime lien for his wages up to the date of the arrest of the ship. Section 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), applies to all vessels, British and foreign, and gives the master of a foreign ship the same rights and remedies as the master of a British ship.—"TAGUS," THE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1903] P. 44; 72 L. J. P. 4; 87 L. T. 598.

SOLICITOR:—

1. Attachment—Delivery of bill—Service of order—Form of notice of motion—R. S. C., 1883, ord 44, r. 2.—An order had been made on a solicitor for delivery of bill on a client's petition within a certain period. The period therein fixed was extended by a later order, but that order was not drawn up nor served upon the solicitor. On a motion to attach the solicitor, Held, that the order extending the time should have been drawn up and served on the solicitor, and this not having been done, that the motion failed.—SEAL, A SOLICITOR, RE, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 164; [1903] 1 Ch. 87; 72 L. J. Ch. 58; 87 L. T. 731.

2. Client—Agency—Solicitor's power as agent to compromise actions.—A solicitor has a general power to compromise an action on behalf of his lay client, provided (a) he acts reasonably and bonâ fide, and (b) than he is not restrained by any express prohibition; and this rule applies equally to the solicitor on the record acting as agent for the solicitor of the lay client.—NEWEN (DECEASED), RE, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 297; [1903] 1 Ch. 812; 72 L. J. Ch. 356; 88 L. T. 264.

3. Costs—Taxation—Action in Mayor's Court—Certificate awarding costs on higher scale—Taxation of costs of unsuccessful party's solicitor—Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890, r. 13.—In an action in the Mayor's Court to recover a sum of £40 the plaintiff recovered judgment, and the judge who tried the action gave a certificate, under rule 13 of the Mayor's Court Rules (Fees and Costs), 1890, awarding the plaintiff costs on the scale applicable where £50 or over was recovered. The solicitor, who acted for the defendant in the action, delivered to the defendant a bill of costs, which included his costs of the action in the Mayor's Court and also costs in other matters, such as conveyancing, in which he had acted for the defendant. The defendant obtained a common order to tax the bill in the High Court, and the master taxed that part of the bill which related to the costs of the action in the Mayor's Court upon the scale where £50 or over was claimed.

Held, that the effect of the order of the judge of the Mayor's Court was to take the action for all purposes out of the lower scale and to place it in the higher scale, and that, therefore, the taxing-master was right.—BRIGGS (JAMES) & SON, RE, C.A., 577; [1903] 2 K. B. 156.

4. Costs—Taxation—Disbursement—Money paid to "Security for Costs Account"—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—Moneys paid by a solicitor on behalf of a client to the "Security for Costs Account" in respect of discovery and interrogatories are not payments which the solicitors are bound to make either by law or custom. Consequently they cannot be treated as "disbursements" within section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, but must go into the cash account as money lent by the solicitor to his client.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (50 W. R. 629), reversed. —BUCKWELL & BERKELEY, RE, C.A., 21; [1902] 2 Ch. 596; 71 L. J. Ch. 713; 87 L. T. 215.

5. Costs—Taxation—Parliamentary agents—Bill of costs for work done by solicitor as parliamentary agent—Jurisdiction to tax—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—A bill of costs of a parliamentary agent, who is also a solicitor, if it relates exclusively to work done by him as a parliamentary agent, cannot be taxed in the High Court under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.—BAKER, LEES, & Co., RE, C.A., 246; [1903] 1 K. B. 189; 72 L. J. K. B. 136; 87 L. T. 662.

6. Costs—Taxation— Time limit — Extension of time—Jurisdiction of taxing officer—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, regulation 57.—The direction in an order of course for taxation of a bill delivered more than one month and less than twelve months, on the client's application, that "the said master is to make his certificate in a month, unless the said master shall think fit to extend the time to enable him to make his certificate, or this order is to be of no effect," is not a direction by the court or a judge which deprives the taxing officer of the jurisdiction given to him by regulation 57 of rule 27 of order 65, and consequently the taxing-master can grant an extension of time for the taxation on an application made after the expiration of the month limited by the order. Time limits, however, whether prescribed by section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, or by the rules of the court, ought not to be lightly disregarded; and therefore such an extension of time should not be made as of course, but only if it appears to the taxing officer to be required by the justice of the case.—MACINTOSH, DIXON, & Co., RE, C.A., 659; 72 L. J. Ch. 609; 88 L. T. 820.

7. Costs—Taxation—Trustees' bill.—An order was obtained by cestui que trust to tax a solicitor's bill delivered to the trustees.

The tenant for life of one moiety of certain trust funds had died on the 22nd of June, 1902, upon which that moiety became divisible among three persons.

Two of the beneficiaries wished to take their shares in specie, but the third wished to have his share realized and a mortgage thereon paid off.

The taxing-master had disallowed the costs of transfer, of attendance to pay off the mortgage, and also costs charged in anticipation for attending the beneficiaries' solicitors, and handing them cheques and transfers.

These latter costs had been included to prevent the necessity of delivering a supplemental bill, but the taxing-master thought that he had no power to allow them.

Held, that the trustees must be allowed their reasonable and proper costs of dividing the estate irrespective of the way in which the costs would ultimately be borne, as this taxation was under section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73).

Held, also, that the solicitor might include reasonable and proper charges which would be incurred in a final division by way of anticipation. —MILES, RE, Ch D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 88 L. T. 863.

8. Fiduciary relationship—Gift by client to solicitor —Purchase by solicitor from client—Competent and independent advice—Avoiding deeds as against solicitor and upholding gifts to client's children in same deeds. —W., being at the same time under considerable financial liabilities, executed in 1900 two deeds settling property in favour of his children, B. and N., and his solicitor, C. The deeds were settled in C.'s office, but were, before execution, inspected and explained to W. by another solicitor, A. In 1901 W. executed a further deed, by which he assigned all his property in favour of B. and N. and C., they covenanting to pay him an annuity. This deed was prepared by another solicitor, T., but C. made alterations in it before execution.

Held, on the evidence, that W. had not competent and independent advice on either occasion, and that all the deeds must therefore be set aside as against C., and that the deed of 1901 must be set aside altogether; but that the deeds of 1900 ought not to be set aside so far as they conferred benefits on W.'s children, B. and N.

The rule laid down by Lord Eldon in Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292, applied.

Held, that an application to the court under the proviso in the above section must be made by counsel.—A SOLICITOR, RE, LAW SOCIETY, EX PARTE, C.A., 561; [1903] 2 K. B. 205; 72 L. J. K. B. 643.

Where a solicitor is charged under the above section, and the charge is established,

Held, that the court has no power to inflict a less punishment than striking the solicitor off the roll.

STOCK EXCHANGE:—

1. Bankruptcy — Receiving order — Stockbroker — Default on Stock Exchange—Administration of assets by Stock Exchange assignee—Right of Stock Exchange creditor to petition in bankruptcy.—A member of the London Stock Exchange having become a defaulter, a Stock Exchange creditor, who has come in and has received dividends under the administration of the defaulter's assets by the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, and has also recovered judgment in an action for his debt, can maintain a petition in bankruptcy against the defaulter, founded on the balance of the judgment debt after deducting the dividends which he has received and for which he must give credit.

The Stock Exchange cessio bonorum does not operate as an accord and satisfaction or a release of the defaulter's debts.—MENDELSSOHN, EX PARTE, MENDELSSOHN, RE, C.A.; [1903] 1 K. B. 216; 72 L. J. K. B. 106; 87 L. T. 721.

2. Default of broker—Liquidation—Completion by jobber with broker's customers—Right of jobber to sue broker for differences.—A broker, who was a member of the London Stock Exchange, was declared a defaulter, there being then due from him to a jobber £986 in respect of the purchase and sale of shares. A further sum of £281 became due on the closing of the broker's accounts at the hammer prices. The broker's customer completed the transactions with the jobber on the next settling day and paid him the sums due, but by the rules of the Stock Exchange the jobber had to account for £281 of the amount so received to the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, who was carrying out the liquidation of the broker's estate. The jobber brought an action against the broker to recover the two sums of £986 and £281. At the date of the trial the liquidation was still proceeding, and the jobber had been paid a dividend.

Held, that the action was maintainable, and that the jobber could recover the amount claimed less the amount of the dividend received.

TELEGRAPH:—

Telephone company—Licence to provide telephonic communication in exchange area—New licence to local authority in respect of same area—Continuance of powers to lay down underground wires acquired by company by agreement with local authority—"For the duration thereof"—Telegraph Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 38), s. 3 (1).—Sections 3 (1) of the Telegraph Act, 1899—which provides, under certain circumstance, for the continuance of powers acquired by an existing company by agreement with the local authority before the passing of the Act to lay down underground wires in an exchange area, in the event of a new licence being granted to the local authority or to another company in respect of the same exchange area—applies only to the case where the powers of the company are in existence at the date of the grant of the new licence. Accordingly, where the local authority by virtue of a clause contained in the agreement conferring the powers has duly determined those powers before the date of the grant of the new licence, the section does not operate to continue them.

The words in the section, "those powers shall continue for the period specified in the new licence for the duration thereof," refer to the duration of the powers, and not to the duration of the new licence.

Assuming, therefore, that the powers of the company are in existence at the date of the grant of the new licence, they will be continued, not during the duration of the new licence, but during the period (if any) which the new licence specifies for their continuance.—NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. v. KINGSTON-UPON-HULL CORPORATION, *Ch.D. TITLE DEEDS:—

Custody—Will—Land purchased by equitable tenant for life, under power, with moneys belonging to personal estate—Lien of trustees on land to secure purchase-moneys.—A testator gave real and personal property in trust to accumulate rents and profits during the minority of H., who was to be (and in fact was) let into possession on attaining twenty-one as tenant for life. A private Act authorized land to be purchased by the court at the instance of a tenant for life of full age, and to be paid for out of the personalty. The moneys so paid were to be deemed a debt from the real to the personal estate, which debt was to be held by the trustees as part of the personalty and secured by a lien on the purchased land. Subject to such lien the purchased land was to be settled on the trusts of the will.

Held, that, as to land so purchased, the trustees, so long as their lien existed, were entitled to the custody of the title deeds.—WHEELER v. TOOTELL, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 693.

TOLLS:—

1. Bicycle—Carriage hung on springs—5 Geo. 4, c. cxiv. s. 78.—By a private Act of Parliament passed in the reign of George IV. the defendants were empowered to levy tolls (inter alia) for every coach, chariot, hearse, chaise, berlin, landau and phaeton, gig, whiskey, car, chair, or coburg, and for every other carriage hung on springs, the sum of sixpence for each wheel, and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same the sum of twopence.

Held, by Wright, J., that a bicycle which had a saddle hung on springs was a carriage hung on springs within the meaning of the section, but that the section only referred to carriages drawn by horses or other beasts of draught, and that therefore a bicycle ridden over the bridge was not chargeable within the section.

Held, by the Court of Appeal that a bicycle did not come within the class of carriage in respect of which the Act gave power to levy a toll.

2. Bicycle—"Sledge, drag, or such-like carriage"—39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii., s. 11.—By section 11 of 39 Geo. 3, c. xxviii. the owners of a bridge across the Severn were empowered to take the following, amongst other, tolls for passage over the bridge: "For every coach, chariot, landau, berlin, hearse, chaise, calash, chair, or other such-like carriage," a certain sum, according to the number of horses drawing it; "for every sledge, drag, or such-like carriage, the sum of 6d."

Held, that a bicycle was not a "such-like carriage" to a sledge or drag, and was not therefore chargeable with a toll of 6d.—SMITH v. KYNNERSLEY, C.A., 548; [1903] 1 K. B. 788; 72 L. J. K. B. 357; 88 L. T. 449.

TRADE-MARK:—

1. Label—Words "trade-mark" printed on part only of label—Misleading label—Removal from register—Innocent deception.—There is no general rule that whenever the words "trade-mark" appear on a label they must be intended to refer solely to the particular part of the label on which they are placed.

To justify the removal of a trade-mark from the register, on the ground that it is calculated to deceive, it must be shown that it is reasonably calculated to injure some person, and is not a mere innocent deception which would injure no one.

In re Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Marks, [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 39 W. R. Dig. 237, distinguished.

2. Infringement—Registration—Meaning of "distinctive device"—Mark in common use in the trade—Non-user as a trade-mark—Bonâ fide intention to use.—A trade-mark consisting of the head and shoulders of the picture known as Gainsborough's "Duchess of Devonshire" was registered by the plaintiffs in January, 1892, in class 38, for "hats, bonnets, and similar head coverings." It was alleged that the defendant, who also carried on a millinery business, had infringed the plaintiffs' trade-mark by affixing to his premises, while in the course of erection, a board upon which there was a painted reproduction of the duchess; that he had also exhibited the same mark upon posters and advertisements in connection with his business, and that he used boxes for delivering millinery, &c., and notepaper containing reproductions of the plaintiffs' trade-mark. The defendant alleged that he had for seven years past or thereabouts used representations of the duchess in various ways in connection with his business as a milliner. It was proved that the picture in question had from the year 1876 been in common use in the hat and millinery trade as an ornamentation upon various papers, circulars, &c., used by milliners in their business. The plaintiffs had never used the trade-mark on the actual goods supplied by them, but they had often used it on labels affixed to the boxes in which the goods were delivered to customers as well as on bills, receipts, &c. The defendant had used the mark which constituted the alleged infringement in a similar manner.

Held, that, in 1892, when the trade-mark was registered, it was not "distinctive" or capable of distinguishing the goods of the plaintiff as his manufacture or selection from the goods of all other persons; that it was not therefore capable of registration, and that it must be expunged from the register.

Semble, that, in order to justify the removal of a trade-mark from the register on the ground of non-user, it must be shown either (a) that at the date of registration there was no bonâ fide intention to use it, and that it has never in fact been used; or (b), if there was a bonâ fide intention to use and actual user for a short time, there has been actual abandonment over a long period of time.—LOUISE & CO. v. GAINSBOROUGH, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 87 L. T. 591.

3. Old mark—Registration—Lapse—Re-registration—Action for infringement—Motion to expunge—Delay—Costs—Application for certificate that right to mark has come in question in an action—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64, 77*a*, 79, and Patents, &c., Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), ss. 10, 18.—Words, &c., to be registered under section 64, sub-section 3 (ii.), of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, amended by the Patents, &c., Act, 1888, must not merely have been "special and distinctive" at some previous time, but must be so at the date of registration.

Quære, whether a word which has been applied to an article because it is apt to describe that article can be distinctive of manufacture or sale by a particular person.

The jurisdiction to order a trade-mark to be struck out of the register is given for the protection of the public and not of the applicant only. Accordingly an application for this purpose will not be refused for delay (or other conduct) on the part of the applicant, unless such delay has made it unduly hard for the respondent to produce evidence. But an applicant who, with knowledge of the registration, has delayed unduly will not, if successful, get his costs.

The question whether there is such a resemblance between two designs, or names, or the get-up of two articles, or the like, as is calculated to deceive customers, is not to be determined by the testimony of the witnesses, but is a question for the judge himself, viewing the exhibits or considering the names, in the light of the evidence as to the circumstances in which they are used.

London General Omnibus Co. v. Lavell, [1901] 1 Ch. 135, 49 W. R. Dig. 144, considered.

When the plaintiff and the defendant in an action have each succeeded in part and failed in part, and there is likely to be great difficulty and dispute in apportioning the different items of costs as between the different issues, the judge at the trial will order the costs to be taxed as a whole and paid by the parties in such proportions as he may think fit.

A certificate, under section 77*a* of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, that the right to the exclusive use of a trade-mark has come in question in an action, will not be given when the right, though put in issue, has not been investigated in such a manner as to enable the court to form an opinion about it. —BOURNE v. SWAN & EDGAR, *Ch.D. 4. Registration—Dormant mark—Entire class—Use of mark in respect of part of class—Assignment—Limitation of use of mark to part of goods in class—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 90,—The register of trade-marks may be rectified by excluding from the specification of good in respect of which a mark is registered, goods in regard to which at the time of registration there was no actual employment of such mark nor any intention to employ the same, although the person registering the trade-mark may have sold such goods under other marks.—HART'S TRADE-MARK, RE. Ch.D. Byrne, J., 107; [1902] 2 Ch. 621; 71 L. J. Ch. 869; 87 L. T. 426.

TRADE NAME:—

Corsets—"Erect Form"—Printed as a scroll—Imitation—Descriptive name—Fanciful name—Calculated to mislead—Evidence.—The plaintiffs were manufacturers of corsets in the United States, and in March, 1901, introduced a certain class of their corsets into the United Kingdom. These corsets were designated in the advertisements relating to them, upon the boxes in which they were sold, and, generally, as "W. B. Erect Form Corsets," the words "Erect Form Corsets" being printed in special fancy type in the manner of a scroll. For the letters "W. B." were shortly afterwards substituted the words "America's Leading," printed in ordinary type. About the month of October, 1901, when the plaintiffs had effected sales of their corsets to a substantial amount in the United Kingdom, and such corsets had acquired some reputation therein, the defendant company resolved to make use of the term "Erect Form Corsets" in connection with goods of their own manufacture; and, in fact, did so use that term, printing it in the form of a scroll like that adopted by the plaintiffs, and placing the company's trade-mark, the letters "C. B.," sometimes before and sometimes both before and after the scroll. The defendant company had previously advertised in the trade journals stating what they proposed to do.

Held, that, although it was to be taken that the conduct of the defendant company had not misled persons in the trade generally, yet such conduct was calculated to cause the corsets of the defendant company to be mistaken for the plaintiffs' by those who had been the ultimate purchasers of the plaintiffs' corsets, and by those who for any reason desired to purchase corsets of the same manufacture; and an injunction granted to restrain the defendant company, their servants and agents, from selling or causing to be sold any corsets not of the plaintiffs' manufacture under the name of "Erect Form Corsets" without distinguishing such corsets from the plaintiffs' corsets.—WEINGARTEN v. BAYER, *Ch.D. TRADE UNION:—

1. Action by member—Rules—Restraint of trade—Illegal society. Under the rules of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors, some of which were in restraint of trade, it was provided by rule 32 that if a member acted contrary to the interests of the society or its rules he was to be fined or expelled.

Held, that the society was an illegal one, and that an action would not lie against it at the suit of one of its members.—CULLEN v. ELWIN, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 686.

2. Application of funds contrary to rules—Action for injunction by individual member of union—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 4, sub-section 3.—Where a trade union, formed for the purpose (among others) of providing benefits for members, and registered under the Trade Union Act, 1871, were proposing to apply funds of the union to purposes not sanctioned by its rules, and in contravention of essential provisions of those rules, which defined the nature and objects of the union, and the trustees of the union were acquiescing in the application of the funds as aforesaid.

Held, that an action was maintainable by an individual member of the union for an injunction to restrain such a misapplication of the funds, inasmuch as it was not a proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing an agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union to provide benefits to members within the meaning of the Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 4, sub-section 3.

By one of the rules of a trade union provision was made for the weekly allowance of strike pay to members, who were "permitted to cease work by the sanction of the association in accordance with the rules." A cessation of work by members of the union having taken place without the sanction of the association, its sanction was afterwards obtained for the continuance of that cessation as from a date subsequent to its original commencement.

Held (by Vaughan Williams, Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ., Stirling, L.J., doubting), that the rule did not authorize the union to allow weekly strike pay to the strikers subsequently to the sanction of the association being obtained as aforesaid.

By one of the rules of a trade union provision was made for the allowance of weekly strike pay in cases where members were "thrown out of employment" in consequence of any action legally taken by the union. Members of the union, who had been employed at a colliery, and who had struck of their own accord, and not in consequence of any action taken by the union, failed in an attempt made by them some time afterwards to obtain re-employment at the colliery, which failure was alleged to have been in consequence of action taken by the union.

Held, that the rule could not be applied to their case, because they could not be said to have been "thrown out of employment" within its meaning. —HOWDEN v. YORKSHIRE MINERS' ASSOCIATION, C.A.; [1903] 1 K. B. 308; 72 L. J. K. B. 176; 88 L. T. 134.

3. Inducing breach of contract—Illegal means—Bona fides.—By an indenture of apprenticeship a firm of stonemasons contracted to teach the plaintiff, who was twenty-five years of age, the trade of a mason. By becoming parties to the rules of the the defendant trade union the firm had contracted not to take apprentices over sixteen years of age. In order to compel the firm to comply with this latter contract the defendants threatened to withdraw the workmen employed by the firm if the plaintiff was taught the trade of a mason; and in consequence of this the firm broke their contract with the plaintiff.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against the defendants, for the defendants had knowingly and for their own ends procured the commission of an actionable wrong, and had procured it by the use of illegal means, and it was immaterial that they seemed to have acted in good faith and in the best interests of their society.

4. Master and workman—Procuring breach of contract of service—Whether malice essential to illegality. —It is not unlawful for workmen to induce their fellow-workmen to break a contract of service if it be done bonâ fide and without any desire to injure the master.

In 1901 the South Wales Miners' Federation issued a manifesto ordering the men to stop work on certain days known as "stop days." This action occasioned great damage to the masters, but was induced by the workmen's bonâ fide belief that the price of coal would be thereby raised. In an action for damages by the masters,

Held, that no action would lie, as it was an essential element of an action in respect of procuring a breach of contract that actual malice should be proved against the defendant.—GLAMORGANSHIRE COAL CO. v. SOUTH WALES MINERS' FEDERATION, K.B.D., 59; [1903] 1 K B. 118; 71 L. TRAMWAY:—

1. Interference with gas mains and service pipes —Arbitration — Jurisdiction of arbitrator. —An arbitrator appointed to determine a difference arising under section 30 of the Tramways Act, 1870, has jurisdiction to order gas mains already laid down to be lowered, so that any new service pipes might be carried horizontally underneath the concrete bed of the tramway; and he further can order such gas mains to be moved laterally to such a distance as to enable access to be obtained to them without interference with the concrete bed.—ILFORD GAS CO. AND ILFORD URBAN COUNCIL, RE, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 236.

2. Liability of company to keep their portion of the roadway in proper condition—Sanding slippery road —Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 28.—The Tramways Act, 1870, s. 28, requires the tramway company to maintain and keep in good condition and repair that portion of the road for which they are responsible, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority should direct. The tramway company (as required) laid its portion of the road with granite blocks, which became worn and consequently dangerous in certain states of the weather. An accident occurred through the company neglecting to lay down sand on its portion of the road, which would have counteracted the slippery nature of the surface.

Held, that the company was liable.—DUBLIN UNITED TRAMWAYS CO. v. FITZGERALD, H.L., 321; [1903] A. C. 99; 72 L. J. P. C. 52; 87 L. T. 532.

3. Local authority—Purchaser of part—"Lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant suitable to and used" for undertaking.—By section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, a local authority is empowered under certain circumstances to purchase compulsorily the tramways within its district "upon terms of paying the then value . . . of the tramways and all lands, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district." Where part of the tramways within a local authority's district already belonged to the authority, but were worked by the promoters of the rest of the tramways within the district jointly with such promoters' part, on the local authority purchasing the promoters' part, it is bound under section 43 to take all the lands, works, materials, and plant used by the promoters for the joint working of the whole system as lands, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable and used by them for the purposes of" the the part of the tramways belonging to the promoters.—MANCHESTER CARRIAGE AND TRAMWAYS CO. AND THE MANCHESTER CORPORATION, RE, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 504.

4. Notice to purchase—Right to possession—Injunction.—A tramway had been worked by a tramway company as a horse tramway. The tramway within the city of M. belonged to the corporation, but had been leased to the company until the 30th of November, 1902. The tramway outside the city belonged to the company. The local authority gave notice to purchase under section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, and the amount of the purchase money was to be ascertained by arbitration. The arbitrator made his award in the form of a special case, awarding different amounts: If the local authority was compelled to purchase the whole plant and stock of the company a much larger amount was payable than if the local authority was only bound to take over a proportion of the stock and plant bearing the same proportion to the whole stock and plant of the company that the tramway without the city bore to the whole tramway the company formerly worked. The local authority claimed to be entitled to take possession of the line of the company before the purchase money had been finally ascertained.

Held, that, even if there had been a concluded agreement, it was impossible to say that property contracted to be sold could be treated as sold without payment of the purchase money, and that an injunction must be granted restraining the defendants from taking or retaining possession of the plaintiffs' property.—MANCHESTER CARRIAGE AND TRAMWAYS CO. v. MANCHESTER CORPORATION, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 87 L. T. 678.

5. "Substantial commencement" of works — Notice in London Gazette—"Conclusive evidence"—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 18).—A notice purporting to be published by the Board of Trade in the London Gazette to the effect that the works of a tramway have not been substantially commenced, though made conclusive evidence of such non-commencement by section 18 of the Tramways Act, 1870, is not the only admissible evidence of such non-commencement.

"Substantial commencement" in the same section means the execution of physical works. Such preliminary steps as the buying of land for the erection of buildings and the entering into contracts for the supply of machinery and cars do not amount amount to a substantial commencement within the section.

TREASURE-TROVE:—

Crown — Prerogative — Charter — Franchise.—In 1896, in the course of ploughing a field near the shore of Lough Foyle, certain gold articles, all lying together in a space of about nine inches, were discovered at a depth of about eighteen inches beneath the surface of the field. The articles, which were probably made between A.D. 200 and A.D. 400, were of considerable value and of a miscellaneous description, including the model of a boat and a hollow collar, inside of which were concealed several plaited chains. The articles were purchased privately by the Trustees of the British Museum.

On a claim by the Crown for delivery up of the articles as being treasure-trove,

Held, (1) that the true inference to be drawn from the above circumstances was that the articles were originally intentionally concealed for the purpose of security, and, therefore, were, primâ facie, treasure-trove; (2) that the onus lay upon the defendants to adduce satisfactory evidence to displace this primâ facie inference, and that the defendants had failed to do so.

Held, further, that a grant by charter from the Crown of lands, together with all "franchises," did not by the word "franchises" pass the right to treasure-trove.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BRITISH MUSEUM, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 582; 88 L. T. 858.

TRUSTEE:—

1. Accounts—Disallowance—Payment of voluntary school rate—"Fair and reasonable" payment.—A payment of a mere voluntary subscription by a trustee cannot be allowed in his account, but where such payment, although in one sense voluntary, is made reasonably and in the honest belief that it will benefit the estate, either as saving a future compulsory payment of larger amount or as being fairly and reasonably necessary under the circumstances of the estate, it may be allowed.—HOW v. WINTERTON (EARL), Kekewich, J., 262.

2. Assignment—Priority—Reversionary trust fund —Notice to one of several trustees—Death of trustee who had notice.—In a contest for priority between assignees of a reversionary interest in a trust fund where one only of several trustees has notice of an assignment and dies, a subsequent assignee who gives notice of his assignment to the then existing trustees is entitled to priority over the prior assignee.

So held on the authority of Timson v. Ramsbottom (1837) 2 Keen 35, 44 R. R. 183.—PHILLIPS' TRUSTS, RE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1903] 1 Ch. 183; 72 L. J. Ch. 94; 88 L. T. 9.

3. Breach of trust—Following trust moneys—Banking account.—When the private money of a trustee and that which he holds in a fiduciary capacity have been mixed in the same banking account, from which various payments have been from time to time made, then, in order to determine to whom any remaining balance, on any investment paid for out of the account, ought to belong, the trustee must be debited with all sums that have been withdrawn and irrecoverably applied to his own use, and the trust money be debited with any sums taken out and properly invested; and the order of priority in which the withdrawals and investments have been made is immaterial.—OATWAY, RE, HERTSLET v. OATWAY, *Ch.D. 5. Investments — Corporation, Stock issued by— Authorized investment—Stock of municipal borough— Limit of population—Returns of last census—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 1 (m).—In the returns of the census, made in April, 1901, it is stated that the population of the borough of Bournemouth was 47 003. But in a note at the foot of the page it is stated that by an order of the Local Government Board, which came into operation on the 9th of November, 1901, the borough was extended so as to embrace two specified urban districts and parts of two other parishes, and that the figures at the date of the census were for Bournemouth 59,762.

Held, that under section 1 (m) of the Trustee Act, 1893, trustees were authorized to invest in stock issued by the corporation.

Some years after the death of one trustee, the survivor, who had made every reasonable effort to dispose of the shares, but without success, paid a call of £800 as a contributory in the liquidation of the company.

Held, that the deceased trustee's representatives, though not liable to the company for the call, were liable to the surviving trustee for contribution.

8. Lease—Renewal—Personal incapacity to benefit—Partial interest—Absence of unfair dealing—Rebuttable presumption of law.—The mere fact that a person has only a partial interest in a lease does not in itself disentitle him to take a renewal of the lease for his own benefit. Any presumption of law that the renewal is for the benefit of all the persons interested in the original lease may be rebutted by evidence that there has been no fraud or unfair dealing towards the other persons interested on the part of the person obtaining the renewal, provided that his position with regard to them is neither clearly fiduciary nor of such a special character that he owes a duty towards them by virtue thereof; in either of which cases the presumption of law of his personal incapacity to retain the benefit is irrebuttable.—BISS v. BISS, C.A., 504; [1903] 2 Ch. 40; 72 L. 11. Voluntary settlement — Realty — Common law grant—Covenant for further assurance—No power of revocation reserved—Disclaimer of trustee by deed—Effect on settlement—Subsequent mortgage by settlor—Marshalling.—Where real estate was in 1866 settled by a voluntary deed operating by way of common law grant, and containing a covenant by the settlor for further assurance, but no power of revocation, and the trustee, who had not executed the settlement, in March, 1867, by deed disclaimed the trusts, and the settlor by deed-poll in April, 1867, purported to revoke the settlement, and in 1888 conveyed certain of the estate comprised in the settlement by way of mortgage, and died in 1898, and the mortgage was in 1899 transferred to the executors of his will in trust for his estate, the mortgagee having been paid off out of his assets, it was held that the settlement had been duly constituted, and that the legal estate in the settled realty passed to the trustee and continued in him up to the time of his disclaimer, and that upon such disclaimer the trust created by the settlement was not destroyed, but that the settlor thereupon became the trustee thereof; and further, that, under the doctrine of marshalling, the persons claiming under the settlement were entitled to have the amount of the mortgage thrown primarily on the unsettled estate.—MALLOTT v. WILSON, *Ch.D. Held, that the certificate was no defence.—HINDS v. ELSAM, K.B.D.; 88 L. T. 867.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER:—

1. Building scheme—Restrictive stipulations—Right to enforce—Notice.—Where an estate is sold in lots at successive sales under a building scheme imposing restrictive stipulations on the lots, a purchaser can only enforce the stipulations against property shown as lotted in the plan and subject to the stipulation at the sale at which he purchases.

A purchaser can enforce the stipulations, although his conveyance contains an accidental or (semble) an intentional departure therefrom, as, notwithstanding the form of the conveyance, the purchaser is not entitled to the benefit of this departure as against other purchasers, nor are they bound by it.

Mackenzie v. Childers, (1889) 43 Ch. D. 265, and Knight v. Simmonds, (1896) 1 Ch. 653, 2 Ch. 294, applied.

Semble, a sub-purchaser of part of a lot can enforce the stipulations, although, previously to his purchase, his vendor had committed a breach on another part.

Where property is sold under an open contract, and no restrictions appear on the title, the mere fact that that the vendor's solicitor proposes to insert restrictive stipulations in the conveyance, which are partly waived and partly insisted on, is not sufficient to affect the purchaser or his solicitor with notice that the property is already subject to restrictions.—ROWELL v. SATCHELL, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 212.

2. Conditions of sale—Wilful default—Form of conveyance—Honest mistake—Interest—Vendor in possession—Account of rents and profits not on the footing of wilful default—Occupation rent—Losses incurred by vendor in carrying on business.—A contract provided that interest should be paid on the purchase-money if the completion were delayed from any cause other than the wilful default of the vendors. The vendors insisted on the insertion of a particular clause in the conveyance, the purchaser brought an action and obtained judgment for specific performance.

Held, by Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ. (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente), that the purchaser was liable to pay interest on the purchase-money.

By Stirling, L.J.—The persistence of the vendors in having the clause inserted, though arising out of an honest mistake on their part, amounted to wilful default within the contract, but the real cause of the delay in completion having been the inability of the purchaser to find the purchase-money, he was not thereby relieved from his liability for interest.

By Cozens-Hardy, L.J.—The vendors had not been guilty of wilful default within the meaning of the contract.

By Vaughan Williams, L.J.—The vendors had been guilty of wilful default within the meaning of the contract, and had thereby become disentitled to any interest.

Held, that, notwithstanding the completion of the conveyance of the house, S. could maintain an action against C. for failing to supply and fix certain articles, and for not completing the house in a proper and workmanlike manner.—SAUNDERS v. COCKRILL, K.B.D.; 87 L. T. 30.

4. Executor—Charge of debts and legacies—Power of executor to sell land and to grant easements to provide for payment of debts and legacies—Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859, Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), ss. 14, 15, 16, 18—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 7—The Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, ss. 22, 31, 32.—A testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees (who were also appointed executors) upon trust for sale and conversion, and directed that if his residuary personal estate should be insufficient to provide for his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts and legacies, his residuary real estate should stand charged with payment of such deficiency, and authorized the trustees to raise such deficiency by mortgage of his residuary real estate; and the testator devised his residuary real estate in case (as happened) no son of his should have attained the age of twenty-five years during his lifetime, to the use of such son of his as after his death should first attain the age of twenty-five years in fee. The testator died in 1875. At his death part of his residuary real estate was incumbered and the legal estate was outstanding. The residuary personal estate proved insufficient to pay the legacies. The testator's eldest son attained twenty-five years in 1888, and subsequently settled the real estate, subject to prior incumbrances, and died in 1897. In 1901 the surviving executor and trustee of the testator's will contracted to sell part of the residuary real estate to the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation, and further to grant to them an easement over other parts of the residuary real estate.

Held, that the vendor, as executor, had power (apart from any common law right) to sell the land under section 16 of Lord St. Leonards' Act; and that section 18 of that Act did not apply, because at the date of the testator's death there was no devisee within the meaning of that section who could sell the land.

Held, also, that under the joint operation of section 32 of the Barrow-in-Furness Corporation Act, 1901, and section 7 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, the vendor was not competent to grant the easement.—BARROW-IN-FURNESS CORPORATION AND RAWLINSON, RE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 248; [1903] 1 Ch. 339; 72 L. J. Ch. 233; 87 L. T. 724.

5. Leaseholds—Deducing title—Single document—Solicitor and client—Costs—Scale charge—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), General Order under, Schedule I., Part I.—Practice—Taxation—Vendor and purchaser summons, raising question of taxation on—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78).—On a sale of leaseholds, the delivery of an abstract of the vendor's title consisting of the lease only is not "deducing title" so as to entitle the vendor's solicitor to the scale charge under Schedule I., Part I., of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

Wellby v. Still, [1894] 3 Ch. 641, followed.

Semble, per Romer, L.J.: A question as to the amount of the vendor's costs on a sale is not properly raised upon an ordinary summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, the solicitor not being a party to and therefore not bound by the proceedings. Such a question should be raised on taxation.—WEBSTER AND JONES' CONTRACT, RE, C.A.; [1902] 2 Ch. 551; 71 L. J. Ch. 749; 87 L. T. 213.

6. Leaseholds—Open contract—Breach of covenant to repair—Dangerous structure—Knowledge of purchaser—Last receipt for rent produced—London Building Acts, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.) and 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. cxxxvii.)—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 3, sub-section 4.—On an open contract for the sale of leaseholds the purchaser is not precluded by section 3, sub-section 4, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881—which makes the production of the last receipt for rent evidence that the covenants in the lease have been observed, unless the contrary appears — from proving breaches of covenant by the vendor, even though the purchaser was aware of those breaches. That sub-section only throws on the purchaser the burden of proving breaches of covenant.

7. Leaseholds—Sale by executor—Non-existence of debts.—An executor can sell leasehold property, either for the purpose of paying debts (even after twenty years from the testator's death) or for the purpose of defraying other expenses of administering his testator's estate; but where an executor-vendor gives the purchaser notice that there are no debts, and does not assert that the sale is made for the purpose of defraying other expenses of administration, he cannot make out such a title as can be forced upon a purchaser.

8. Mistake—Bidding for wrong property—Contract signed by auctioneer—Authority—Error in date—Statute of Frauds.—A bidder at an auction bid for one property in the belief that he was bidding for another. The property was knocked down to him, but on finding out his mistake he refused to sign the contract. The auctioneer signed the contract on his behalf. The contract signed had been prepared with a view to an earlier sale, and bore date one month earlier than the actual date of the sale.

Held, that there was no memorandum in writing of the alleged contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

9. Priority—Equitable mortgage—Notice—Forged signature—Receipt—Legal estate—Title deeds.—A purchaser, who having notice of the existence of an equitable charge on the purchased property leaves it to the vendor to pay off such charge, is not protected against such equitable charge by possession of the legal estate and the title deeds in the event of the vendor failing to discharge it, even though there has been no negligence on his part and he has been deceived by the production of a receipt which was forged by the vendor's solicitor.—JARED v. CLEMENTS, C.A., 401; [1903] 1 Ch. 428; 72 L. J. Ch. 291; 88 L. T. 97.

10. Specific performance—Contract in letters—Contract "subject to an agreement"—Reference to formal contract—Intention—Statute of Frauds.—In answer to an offer to purchase land for £275, the vendor accepted "subject to the conditions of sale and an agreement." At that time the property was subject to some incumbrances which the vendor had not yet removed, though he was trying so to do. The purchaser had apparently been allowed to go on the land, and had executed some repairs there, but the vendor had remained in occupation. The conditions of sale referred to were conditions used at an abortive auction at which the property had been offered for sale.

Held, on the facts, in an action by the purchaser for specific performance, that there was in this case no concluded contract.

11. Trustee—Leasehold—Unauthorized purchase—Power of sale.—A testatrix by her will appointed her husband, H. B., sole trustee and executor, and gave two legacies of £3,000 each to her nephews W. and R. absolutely subject to prior life interest.

By a codicil the testatrix stated that she did not wish her nephews to have a vested interest unless they obtained the age of twenty-one years, and she gave the legacies and the residue of her estate to the two nephews on their attaining twenty-one years, and if only one attained twenty-one she gave him both legacies and the residue absolutely. If both died under twenty-one the legacies and residue were to go to her statutory next-of-kin of the whole blood as if she had died unmarried.

The testatrix died on the 9th of November, 1899.

H. B., out of the legacy of £3,000 to R. or out of residue, purchased a leasehold house for £2,100, although there was no power in the will authorizing him so to do, and spent £400 of the trust estate in improving the house.

By his will, dated the 31st of July, 1900, he appointed the vendors his executors and trustees, and he died on the 21st of December, 1901.

The vendors on the 29th of October, 1902, agreed to sell the house for £2,600, but the purchaser objected that, as the purchase was made in breach of trust, the beneficiaries under the will had a right to affirm the purchase and elect to keep the house.

Held, that the legal personal representatives of the trustee were entitled to realize the investment improperly made by their testator, and that it was their duty to do so to ascertain the liability.

Held, also, that the purchaser was not entitled to insist on one of the beneficiaries joining in the conveyance.—JENKINS AND RANDALL'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 362; 88 L. T. 628.

12. Trustees with power of sale—Resale before completion to trustee—Specific performance—Damages—Substitution of name of purchaser's nominee in conveyance for name of purchaser.—A purchaser from co-trustees is not entitled to resell to one of such co-trustees while the original contract remains executory, nor will such purchaser be entitled under such circumstances either to specific performance or damages against the trustee to whom he has agreed to sell, nor independently of contract to have such trustee's name inserted in the conveyance in the place of his own.—DELVES v. GRAY, *Ch.D. VICTORIA, LAW of:—

1. Book debts—Invalidity of assignment does not extend to covenants and recitals—Victorian Book Debts Act, 1896, s. 3.—Construction.—By the third section of the Victorian Book Debts Act, 1896, it is enacted that no assignment or transfer of book debts shall be valid unless registered.

Held, that by its true construction only that part of an instrument which effects assignment or transfer is invalidated by non-registration. The invalidity does not extend to the covenants and recitals therein contained.

Where, however, the unregistered assignment of a book debt contained covenants onerous to some of the assignors and a subsequent registered assignment omitted the same,

Held, that the second assignment being in substitution for the first, the covenants were no longer enforceable.—NATIONAL BANK OF AUSTRALASIA v. FALKINGHAM, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 585; 71 L. J. P. C. 105; 87 L. T. 90.

2. Probate duty—Administration Act, 1890, s. 115—Conveyance, assignment, . . . or transfer with intent to evade payment of duty—Mortgage debt—Land mortgaged situated in different state to testator's domicil.—That part of section 115 of the Administration and Probate Act of Victoria, 1890, relating to conveyances, assignments, gifts, deliveries, or transfers "with intent to evade the payment of duty" is applicable to colourable transactions only. Therefore where a testator, a father, had bonâ fide transferred mortgages to his son to accustom him to the management of business and the responsibilities of property, and to make him independent.

Held, that the property transferred was not liable to duty.

Part of testator's property consisted of a mortgage on land situated in New South Wales, though both he and his mortgagee were resident and domiciled in Victoria, the debt being a speciality debt in New South Wales and a simple contract debt in Victoria.

Held, that the debt was an asset in Victoria, and therefore recoverable under a Victorian probate.—PAYNE v. REX, P.C., 351; [1902] A. C. 552; 71 L. J. P. C. 128; 87 L. T. 84.

No. 773 of Victoria), s. 89, "if any officer not entitled to quarters is allowed to use for the purpose of residence any building belonging to the Government" the Government "may direct that a fair and reasonable sum as rent thereof be deducted from such officer's salary." In the case of officers such as a postmaster and the governor of a gaol, who were obliged to reside in Government buildings in order to discharge properly the duties of their respective offices,

Held, that rent could not be deducted from their salaries under the section.—REX v. FISHER; REX v. BULL, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 158; 72 L. J. P. C. 45; 88 L. T. 74.

WARRANTY:—

Sale—Fertiliser—Warranty on sale—False invoice—Analysis condition precedent to prosecution—"Causing or permitting invoice to be false."—An analysis by the district analyst and the taking of samples in accordance with section 5 of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1893, are not conditions precedent to a prosecution by a county council under that Act. An invoice that stated the article "contains 38 to 45 per cent. total phosphates," whereas it contained only about 31 per cent., is false in a material particular to the prejudice of the purchaser within section 3 (1) (b) of the Act, notwithstanding that the invoice states "Minimum guaranteed subject to conditions printed on the back hereof," and such conditions make provision that if on analysis the phosphates are below the minimum a pro rata allowance will be made to the purchaser. K., the managing director of the sellers of the article, was cognizant of the form of invoice used. He signed letters proving that he knew that article contained various uncertain proportions of phosphates that might have to be ascertained in a particular way. Sales of the article would come under his notice, and the invoice would not be sent out with a guarantee without his knowledge; but there was no evidence that he saw the particular invoice.

Held, that there was evidence upon which K. might be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence under section 3 (1) (b).

2. Supply—Mines and minerals—Support for pipes—Arbitration—Liability to pay compensation.—The appellants were the owners of two water pipes called the C. pipe and the M. pipe. The pipes were laid so close together that support from subjacent minerals could not be removed from one pipe without affecting the support of the other. The C. pipe was laid under a local Act, and for it the appellants had a common law right of support. The M. pipe was laid under an Act which incorporated the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. The respondents, who were the owners of the subjacent minerals, gave notice under section 22 of the Waterworks Clauses Act of their intention to work the minerals under the M. pipe. The appellants thereupon gave a counter-notice under the Act intimating their willingness to pay compensation under the Act "so far as you are entitled thereto," and requiring them to leave the minerals unworked. The respondents accordingly left the minerals unworked, and the amount of compensation was referred to arbitration in the usual course under the Act. The appellants reserved all their right of support to the C. pipe. The arbitrator awarded a sum as compensation for the non-working of the minerals under the M. pipe, but the appellants refused to pay it, on the ground that the right of support for the C. pipe necessarily involved abstention from working the minerals under the M. pipe, and therefore that there was no damage to the respondents for which they were entitled to compensation.

Held, that the appellants, having elected to put in force the procedure provided by the statute, were bound to pay the compensation fixed by the arbitrator in accordance with it, it not appearing that the arbitrator had in any way exceeded his jurisdiction. 3. Underground water—Unknown but ascertainable channel.—The Morton Beck, a river in Yorkshire, derived some of its water from the Sweet Well Spring. Defendants sank wells or shafts on their land in close proximity to the Sweet Well Spring, and by this means some of the water from the spring was alleged to be diverted. Plaintiffs were riparian proprietors on the banks of the Morton Beck.

Held, that plaintiffs had no right of action for the obstruction of the said water, as even assuming the existence of a defined channel, along which the underground water flowed to the well, such channel was not known and could not be ascertained except by excavation of the soil.

WATERWORKS:—

1. Lands compulsorily taken—Special adaptability of site.—An arbitrator, in assessing the value of lands taken for the purposes of a reservoir, may award on extra value in respect of the special adaptability of the site for the purposes of a reservoir even though it cannot be proved that there are other competitors for the site.—GOUGH AND ASPATRIA SILLOTH JOINT WATER BOARD. 2. Prescribed rates of dividend—Surplus profits—Deficiencies in previous years—Incorporation of Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847—Deficiencies in years prior to incorporation of Act—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 75.—A waterworks company, which was incorporated in 1809, obtained in 1864 an Act of Parliament to enable it to amalgamate with another company. This Act provided that from and after the passing of the Act the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, should apply to the whole of the undertaking and waterworks of the company. Before the passing of the Act of 1864 there was no limitation on the rate of dividend which the company might pay. but after that date. by virtue of section 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, no larger dividend than 10 per cent. was permissible, "unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of" 10 per cent.

Held, that the Act of 1847 was not retrospective, but spoke only from the time of its incorporation, and as providing for the future. Consequently the company was not justified in paying a larger dividend than 10 per cent. in order to make up any deficiencies or arrears of dividend which had occurred prior to the year 1864.—LAMPLOUGH v. KENT WATERWORKS CO., C.A.. 535; [1903] 1 Ch. 575; 72 L. WILL:—

1. Absolute gift—Gift over on death "without a will and childless" —Repugnancy.—A testator, after an absolute gift of his residuary real and personal estate among his children equally, provided that in case any of his said children should die "without a will and childless," the share of the child or children so dying should go over to the surviving children.

Held, that the words "without a will and childless" were repugnant to the absolute estate previously given, and the gift consequently did not take effect.—DIXON, RE, DIXON v. CHARLESWORTH, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 652; 72 L. J. Ch. 642; 88 L. T. 862.

2. Accumulation—Direction for accumulation of rents and profits—Purchase of land—Accumulations Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 58).—A testatrix, who died on the 17th of January, 1896, by her will made in 1889, directed that the residue of her property (which consisted largely of surplus rents and profits of landed estate) should be applied to the discharge of incumbrances and the purchase of other landed estate.

Held, that this direction was in contravention of the Accumulations Act, 1892.—LLANOVER, RE, HERBERT v. FRESHFIELD (No. 2), Ch.D. Farwell, J., 615; [1903] 2 Ch. 330; 88 L. T. 856.

3. Ambiguity—Legatee—Construction.—A testatrix by her will gave a legacy to Percy H., son of C. A. H. C. A. H. had no son Percy; but he had a son Herbert who was generally called "Bertie." Two persons, not sons of C. A. H., but who stood to the testatrix in the same degree of relationship as the sons of the said C. A. H., bore the name of Percy, but they did not claim the legacy.

Held that Herbert, son of C. A. H., was entitled to the legacy, the solicitor taking testatrix's instructions having probably mistaken the word Bertie for the word Percy.—HOOPER, RE, HOOPER v. WARNER, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 153; 88 L. T. 160.

4. Appropriation—Contingent legacy.—When a testator gives a sum of cash as a contingent legacy without any provision for the payment of interest before the happening of the contingency, the executor is not entitled of his own authority, and to the possible detriment of the contingent legatee, to invest and appropriate a fund to meet that legacy; and if the fund so appropriated should, owing to depreciation of the security, be insufficient to answer the full amount of the legacy, if and when the legacy becomes payable, the legatee is entitled to have the deficiency made good, either out of the residuary estate or by the executor personally.

5. Charitable legacy—Evidence—Admissibility.—A testatrix bequeathed £4,000 to C. "for the charitable purposes agreed upon between us."

Held, that evidence was admissible to show what were the charitable purposes referred to in the will, but no further; and that as the subject-matter of the legacy on the face of the will was £4,000, evidence was not admissible to show that it was only the income of £4,000 that the testatrix had agreed should be applied for charitable purposes.

Decision of Farwell, J., on this point (50 W. R. 185, [1902] 1 Ch. 214), reversed.—HUXTABLE, RE, HUXTABLE v. CRAWFURD, C.A., 282; [1902] 2 Ch. 793; 71 L. J. Ch. 876; 87 L. T. 415.

6. Charity — Gift to voluntary association for charitable object—Failure of gift.—A testator directed his trustees to sell leasehold and freehold property and to divide the proceeds in legacies to certain individuals named "or their successors" or "his successor."

Held, that the gifts were not given to the individuals for their own benefit, but for charitable objects, and therefore failed.—DELANY, RE, CONOLEY v. QUICK, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 27; [1902] 2 Ch. 642; 71 L. J. Ch. 811; 87 L. T. 46.

7. Charity—Institute erected for the benefit of inhabitants—Legacy for the benefit of the institute—General charitable intention.—A testatrix erected an institute, and during her life it was used for the benefit of the inhabitants of a place. By her will she gave £3,000 to trustees to be applied in such manner as they should consider most expedient for the benefit of the institute.

Held, that there was a general intention and that the legacy was valid.—MANN, RE, HARDY v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 165; [1903] 1 Ch. 232; 72 L. J. Ch. 150; 87 L. T. 734.

8. Class—"My own nephews and nieces"—Half-blood—Husband's nephew described as "my nephew" —Great-niece described as "my niece."—When there is no context to the contrary, a gift to persons of a certain degree of relationship to the donor includes those of the half-blood.

The inaccurate use of a term of relationship in describing a particular person may, but need not, lead to the inference that the same term when used in the same instrument to designate a class includes that person and others to whom it may be equally applicable.

A testatrix gave a gift unto and among "my own nephews and nieces." In another part of the same will she had referred to a person who was her great-niece as "my niece," but in yet another part she had described her correctly as "the daughter of my nephew X." She also referred in her will to a nephew of her husband once by his name alone and once as "my nephew."

Held, that the words "my own nephews and nieces" excluded not only the husband's nephews and nieces, but the testatrix's great-nephews and great-nieces, not excepting the great-niece who had been called "my niece."—COZENS, RE, MILES v. WILSON, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 220; [1903] 1 Ch. 138; 72 L. J. Ch. 39; 87 L. T. 581.

9. Construction—Condition that devisee should take testator's name — Condition precedent — Condition subsequent—Death of devisee in lifetime of tenant for life—Impossibility of performance—Act of God.—A testator devised real estate upon trust for his daughter for life, and after her death for her children; and if she should have no child, then upon trust for his cousin, on condition, nevertheless, that if the testator's wife should be then living she should have the enjoyment of the dwelling-house for the remainder of her then life, and on further condition that he should then take and use the testator's name, but subject to the payment of certain legacies. The devisee died in the lifetime of the testator's daughter without ever having taken the testator's name.

Held, on the construction of the will, that the condition was a condition subsequent which was not intended to operate unless and until the devisee actually came into possession of the estate. The performance of the condition having been rendered impossible by act of God, the estate consequently passed discharged from the condition.

Decision of Joyce, J. ([1902] 2 Ch. 198, 50 W. R. Dig. 186), reversed.—GREENWOOD, RE, GOODHART v. WOODHEAD, C.A., 358; [1903] 1 Ch. 749; 72 L. J. Ch. 281; 88 L. T. 212.

10. Construction—Devise of "my freehold land and hereditaments"—Customary freeholds.—A testatrix devised "my freehold land and hereditaments at M" to A., and the residue of her real and personal estate to trustees. Testatrix was entitled at the date of her death to four closes of land at M, of which two were freeholds and two were customary freeholds. The four closes were in the occupation of A.

Held, that the words "my freehold land and hereditaments" included the customary freeholds. STEEL, RE, WAPPETT v. ROBINSON, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 252; [1903] 1 Ch. 135; 72 L. J. Ch. 42; 87 L. J. 548.

11. Construction—Devise to "B. and her heirs"—Gift over to collateral heirs—Rule of construction—Estate tail.—By his will a testator gave two houses to his daughter A. for life, and after her death as to one house "to her daughter B. and her heirs," and as to the other house "to her son C. and his heirs"; and, further, "if either the said B. or C. should die without an heir their share is to go to the survivor's heir or heirs."

Held, that B. and C. took estates tail, and that the word "heirs" in the last phrase, "the survivor's heir or heirs," must be read as "heirs general" and not as "heirs of the body," although the word had that latter signification throughout the other parts of the will where there were gifts over.—WAUGH v. CRIPPS, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 461; [1903] 1 Ch. 744; 72 L. J. Ch. 586; 88 L. T. 54.

12. Construction—Dying "without leaving any child."—In a gift over in a will upon death "without leaving any child or children," it is a well-settled rule of construction that these words will be construed "without having had any child who has attained a vested interest" under the previous gift; and it makes no difference in the application of this rule of construction that the testator's new at the date of the will that the person on death the gift over is made in fact had a child then living.

13. Construction—Estate in special tail—Issue—Gift to A. if he marries a gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their descendants.—A testator willed and bequeathed certain estates to his son Charles, and after providing that his eldest son might redeem those estates, continued: "The proceeds to go with the limitations of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and has issue male, and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over.

Held, that Charles took an estate in special tail male.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (50 W. R. 83, [1902] 1 Ch. 34) affirmed.—PELHAM CLINTON v. DUKE OF NEWCASTLE, H.L., 608; [1903] A. C. 111; 72 L. J. Ch. 424; 88 L. T. 273.

14. Construction—Gift of income of residue to children for life in equal shares subject to annuity to widow — Advances to some children — Adjustment between advanced and unadvanced children—Hotchpot.—A testator by his will and codicil dated the 5th of May, 1880, and the 12th of July, 1882, respectively, after giving certain legacies, devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees upon trust to pay out of the income thereof the annual sum of £2,000 to his widow during her life, and, subject thereto, to divide the residuary estate into as many shares as there should be children living at his death, and to pay the annual income of such shares to his children; and then upon trusts therein expressed. The testator provided that, as to certain advances already made to some of his children, and as to any future advances to his children exceeding at any one time the sum of £1,000, these advances should be treated as capital of the original shares, and be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly. The testator died on the 3rd of July, 1887, and left surviving him six children; of whom three had received advances and three had not. The widow died in March, 1900.

Held, that for the purpose of ascertaining the proportions of the settled shares of the six children, the value of the net residuary estate of the testator at the day of his death ought to be ascertained, and there should be added thereto the several advances, and that the actual income received from the testator's death ought to be divided in the respective proportions so ascertained, and that the share of each child in such income ought to be debited with one sixth part of the testator's widow's annuity; and therefore any calculation of interest on the amount advanced to any child was unnecessary.—HARGREAVES, RE, HARGREAVES v. HARGREAVES, C.A.; 88 L. T. 100.

15. Construction—Gift of residue in equal shares—Provision that share of legatee dying without leaving issue shall fall into residue—Accruer to survivors—Intestacy.—A testator gave his residuary estate upon trust as to one-fourth for each of his four daughters for life with remainder to their issue, with a provision that the share of any daughter dying without leaving issue should fall into and form part of his residuary estate, and be held and disposed of "on the same trusts as are hereinbefore declared thereof."

Held, that the case fell within In re Palmer, 42

W. R. 151, [1893] 3 Ch. 369, and that on the death of any daughter without leaving issue her share accrued to the surviving daughters, and was not divisible among all the daughters, including the deceased, with an intestacy as to one-fourth of the deceased's original fourth.

Decision of Buckley, J., reversed.—ALLAN, RE, DOW v. CASSAIGNE, C.A., 403; [1903] 1 Ch. 276; 72 L. J. Ch. 159; 88 L. T. 246.

16. Construction—Gift of residue with an exception—Failure of gift comprised in exception—Excepted property held to pass by residuary gift.—A testator gave his residuary estate to his wife absolutely, except as to a sum of £1,000, in which he gave her a life interest, with remainder as to £500 to "my nephew James Jupp," and as to the other £500 to certain other nieces and nephews. It appeared from the evidence that the testator had, so far as was known, no nephew named James Jupp, and though he had had a brother of that name the brother had predeceased him.

Held, that the gift to James Jupp failing, the beneficiaries of the wife were entitled to the £500 bequeathed to him, subject to a liability to refund it should a nephew of the testator bearing that name establish a claim.—JUPP, RE, GLADMAN v. JUPP, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 87 L. T. 739.

17. Construction—Gift over—Death "before becoming entitled"—Entitled "in right" or "in possession"—Vesting.—A testatrix gave real estate to her son R. for his life, and after his death specifically among her grandchildren, R.'s sons and daughters, but in the event of any of her grandchildren dying "before becoming entitled" then over.

Held, upon the construction of the will, that the words "becoming entitled" meant "entitled in possession."

Decision of Joyce, J. (ante, p. 31, [1902] 2 Ch. 875), affirmed.—MAUNDER, RE, MAUNDER v. MAUNDER, C.A., 549; [1903] 1 Ch. 451; 72 L. J. Ch. 367; 88 L. T. 280.

18. Construction—Gift to A. and B. and the children of C.—Gift to a class.—A testator by his will bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees upon trusts for the benefit of his daughter for life, and for her issue, and, in the event of the failure of issue, "in trust for G. B., his sister M. B., and the children now living of R. H., who being male shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being female shall live to attain that age or marry, and if more than one in equal shares." The daughter died unmarried. At the date of the death of the testator there were four children of R. H. living, who all attained the age of twenty-one years.

Held, that the gift was a gift to a class, and that the fund was divisible in equal sixths between G. M., M. B., and the four children of R. H.—KEKEWICH v. BARKER, H.L.; 88 L. T. 130.

19. Construction—Gift to wife of named person—Wife living at date of will—Second wife.—If there is in a will a gift to the wife of a person, who has to the knowledge of the testator a wife living at the time, the primâ facie presumption is that the gift refers to that wife and not to any subsequent wife, and the only question in each case is whether there is a sufficient context in the particular will before the court to negative that primâ facie presumption.

20. Construction—Issue—Gift over.—In a gift over on failure of the line of one child to "other of my children and their issue," the word issue must receive its plain and ordinary meaning, and not be restricted to the issue of children dying in the lifetime of the testatrix unless the rest of the will plainly requires it.—ENDYVEAN v. ARCHER, P.C.; [1903] A. C. 379.

21. Construction—Married woman—Restraint on anticipation—Remoteness—Duration of restraint.—A testator by his will gave his residuary estate to his wife, two daughters, and a son for life, the interests of the wife and the daughters to be without power of anticipation, and after the death of the survivor he gave his estate to the then and future children of his son in equal proportions. By a codicil the testator declared that the bequests to any female taking any beneficial interest under his will should be for her separate use, but so that she might not anticipate any part of the property to which she might become entitled, and he also declared the receipt of any female taking an interest under his will should be a good and sufficient discharge to his trustees for the money after the same should have actually accrued due. The survior of the wife, daughters, and son died in January, 1902. The son left five children living at his death, of whom two were married women.

Held, that the restraint on anticipation was valid, not being void for remoteness, but that it only lasted during the existence of the prior life interests both as to income and corpus, and determined when the property fell into possession in January, 1902.—MILWARD, RE, STRADMAN v. HOBDAY, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 87 L. T. 476.

22. Construction—Parol directions as to disposition—Admissibility—Uncertainty.—A testator, after giving all his property to his wife for life, added the following clause, "I desire and empower her to dispose of my estate by her will or in her lifetime in accordance with my wishes verbally expressed by me to her."

Held, that the clause was void for uncertainty, for parol evidence was not admissible to prove what these wishes were.

24. Construction—Residuary gift and bequest—Subsequent trusts—Real estate—Resulting trust.—A testator gave and bequeathed the residue of his estate and effects to trustees on certain trusts. There was no express trust for sale and conversion of real estate, and primâ facie the trusts were applicable to personal estate.

Held, (1) on the principle of D'Almaine v. Moseley, 1 W. R. 475, 1 Drew. 629, that the words of bequest were sufficient to pass real estate; and (2) on the principle of Saumarez v. Saumarez, 4 My. & Cr. 331, that, inasmuch as the testator had shown an intention to dispose of all his property, and the succeeding trusts did not show an intention only to deal with his personal estate, there was no resulting trust of the real estate.

25. Construction—Rule against perpetuities—Void trust for sale—Intention of testator—Class ascertained with prescribed limit.—Effect will be given to the intention of a testator, which appears from his will, to benefit certain persons who can be ascertained within the rule against perpetuities even though he has directed his intention to be carried out by means of a trust for sale which is void as offending against the rule against perpetuities.

26. Construction — Trust for issue, including an illegitimate son — Intention to legitimate for all purposes.—A testator gave estate A to trustees upon trust for G. F. S. for life or until assignment, and upon failure of such trust in his lifetime upon discretionary trusts for the wife and issue of G. F. S., "including S. S. R., hereinafter named," and subject thereto upon trust for sale, and to hold the proceeds upon trust for the issue of G. F. S., "including S. S. R., the illegitimate son of" G. F. S., and if there should be "no child of the said G. F. S., including the same S. S. R.," then over. The testator gave estate B upon trusts for M. S. for life, and subject thereto, in events which happened, upon trust for (inter alios) the issue of G. F. S., but without expressly including in such class the said S. S. R.

Held, that S. S. R. had been legitimated for all the purposes of the will, and was entitled to share in estate B.—SMILTER, RE, BEDFORD v. HUGHES, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 231; [1903] 1 Ch. 198; 72 L. J. Ch. 102; 87 L. T. 644.

27. Construction—Vesting—Chattels given in trust for person entitled to "actual possession" of real estate—Other personalty given in trust for person for time being "entitled to possession" of real estate—Death of first tenant in tail in lifetime of tenant for life.—Chattels bequeathed as heirlooms upon trust to go along with and be enjoyed by the person for the time being entitled to the "actual" possession of settled real estate do not vest absolutely in a tenant in tail of the real estate who dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life.

Personalty given upon trust for the person for the time being entitled to the possession of real estate as far as the rules of law and equity will permit vests absolutely in the first tenant in tail at birth, unless there be a clear expression of intention that it shall not so vest, and words declaring the testator's general desire that the income of certain personalty shall go in keeping up the real estate, are not such an expression of opinion as will prevent the personalty so vesting. — FOTHERGILL, RE, FOTHERGILL v. PRICE, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 203; [1903] 1 Ch. 149; 72 L. J. Ch. 164; 87 L. T. 677.

28. Devise—Gift of minerals "if they should be worked"—Condition precedent — Perpetuity. — A testator, who died in 1858, by his will, dated in 1845, devised certain freehold property to his son for life, with remainder to his grandson in fee. Subsequently the testator became entitled to the payment of a sum of money for certain lands taken by a railway company for the purposes of their undertaking. Accordingly, by a codicil dated in 1857, the testator bequeathed this sum to his son and his two daughters in equal shares; and he directed that "if the minerals" under the devised property "should be worked," the same should "be divided in the same manner as before mentioned in three parts equal shares."

Held, the gift of the minerals to the testator's son and daughters, not being a present one, so that the minerals should pass to them immediately, but a conditional one, the division of the proceeds depending on the working and sale of the minerals, which condition might not happen within the period allowed by law, the gift was void under the rule against perpetuities.—THOMAS v. THOMAS, C.A.; 87 L. T. 58.

29. Duty—Annuity without any deduction except legacy duty—Republication after passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888—Succession duty—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888 (51 Vict. c. 8), s. 21—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 9.—A testator, by a will made in 1882, gave an annuity to H. for life, and after her death he gave annuities to H.'s children; and he charged all said annuities upon his real estate and directed that they should be paid "without any deductions except for legacy duty and income tax." A codicil, dated the 12th of July, 1888, confirmed the will. The testator died in 1892, and H. in 1900.

Held, that the codicil operated as a republication of the will as from the date of the codicil; that therefore there was a direction for the payment of the annuities to H.'s children "without deduction except legacy duty," made at a time when there was no duty called by that name, another duty called succession duty having been substituted by section 21 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1888, in respect of legacies and annuities charged on the real estate of any person dying after the 1st of July, 1888; and that the devisees of the annuities were liable to pay the succession duty.

Held, also, that the estate duty arising under the Finance Act, 1894, was payable out of the testator's residuary personal estate.—RAYER RE, RAYER v. RAYER, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 538; [1903] 1 Ch. 685; 72 L. J. Ch. 230; 87 L. T. 712.

30. Duty—Bequest of sum "sufficient to pay and discharge all estate duty"—Declaration of trust—Charge on settled estates in respect of duty.—A testator by a codicil to his will, executed after the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, bequeathed to his eldest son, to whom certain settled estates would pass on the testator's death, "a sum of money sufficient to pay and discharge all the estate duty which may be payable by" him; and he directed such sum to be paid out of moneys in the hands of his bankers at his death, but if the sum at the bankers should not be sufficient, he declared that no other part of his estate should be liable to make good the deficiency.

Held, that the legacy was a gift to the eldest son for his own benefit absolutely, and was not impressed with a trust to pay the estate duty out of it; and consequently that the legatee had not lost his right to recoup himself for the duty by a charge on the settled estates under section 9 (6) of the Act.—MEXBOROUGH (EARL) v. SAVILE, H.L.; 88 L. T. 131.

31. Duty—Direction to set apart a fund—"To produce a clear yearly sum"—Settlement estate duty.—A testator directed his trustees to set apart and invest so much of his estate as would produce a clear yearly sum of £400 and pay the income thereof to his wife during her widowhood.

Held, that the settlement estate duty must be paid out of residue.—DYET, RE, MORGAN v. DYET, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 87 L. T. 744.

32. Interest on advances—Period of distribution—Rate of interest—Simple or compound interest—Method of computation.—The period of distribution is, for the purposes of calculation, the date from which interest is to be charged upon advances made by a testator in his lifetime to one of his residuary legatees; and such period of distribution is not the less the death of the testator because he has given to his widow an annuity which has prevented a large part of the residue from being divided during her lifetime.

In calculating the interest to be charged upon advances from time to time made residuary legatees between the testator's death and the time of division of the fund, simple interest is to be charged upon the advances from the dates of payment, and it is not proper to distinguish between the capital and income of the sums advanced and charge interest upon the capital only with annual rests.

The rate of interest to be charged upon advances should now be three, and not four per cent. per annum.

33. Investments—Railway or other "public company"—American company—Investment, trust for—Construction of will.— A testatrix after empowering her trustees to postpone the sale or conversion of any part of her estate, declared that any money by her will directed to be invested should be invested in "any of the public funds, or in Government or real or leasehold securities, or upon the stocks, shares, or securities of any railway or other public company." Some time after her death two shares which she had held in an English steamship company were exchanged for preference and ordinary stock in an American steamship company which had taken over the business of the English company.

Held, that the words "public company," when read in connection with the preceding words of the clause, must be confined to public companies in the United Kingdom, and consequently that the trustees were not authorized to retain the American preference and ordinary stock as an investment.—CASTLEHOW, RE, LAMONBY v. CARTER, Ch.D. Byrne, J.; [1903] 1 Ch. 352; 72 L. J. Ch. 211; 88 L. T. 455.

34. Legacy—Ademption—Particular purpose.—A testator gave a legacy of £500 to his great-niece; by a subsequent settlement he settled a sum of £500 for her benefit.

Held, that the legacy was not adeemed.—SMYTHIES, RE, WEYMAN v. SMYTHIES, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 284; [1903] 1 Ch. 259; 72 L. J. Ch. 216; 87 L. T. 742.

35. Propounding by executors—Testatrix not of sound mind—Costs of executors.—Where executors have had ample opportunity of examining into the state of mind of a testator and of getting a clear knowledge of the whole state of affairs, and yet take upon themselves the responsibility of propounding a will, they do so at their own risk, and if they are defeated on the trial of the action, the court will not, except under special circumstances, interfere with the general rule that costs shall follow the event.—PAGE v. WILLIAMSON, P.D. & Ad.D.; 87 L. T. 146.

36. Real and personal estate—Gift to son for life—Remainder to his children "or their heirs"—Substitutional or alternative—Heirs entitled—Construction.—The testator G. I., by his will dated in 1877, devised and bequeathed unto his wife M. I. absolutely all his real and personal estate, and, at the death of his said wife, to his two sons J. I and H. I. to be divided equally between them, and, at their death, their or his portions or portion if married to their or his child or children or their heirs. G. I. died in 1890; M. I. had died in 1879. J. I. died in 1895; he had two children—M. G., now living, and L. L., who died in 1888. L. L. had one child, S. I. L., born in 1888, and now living.

Held, that S. I. L. was not entitled under the will, and that accordingly M. G. was absolutely entitled to the share in which J. I. had a life estate.—IBBETSON, RE, IBBETSON v. IBBETSON, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 88 L. T. 461.

37. Residuary gift — Named person — Lapse — Limited survivorship clause—Revocation of gift by codicil—Gift to person by wrong name.—A testatrix left her residuary estate to four named persons, A., B., C., and D., "as tenants in common, and if only one of them shall survive me, then to such one absolutely." By a codicil, after referring to the death of D., the testatrix revoked whatever interest D. had in her will. A., B., and C. survived the testatrix.

Held, that the gift of survivorship was intended to be general and not confined to the case of only one legatee dying, and that in any event the revocation clause of the codicil must be construed as directing the residuary bequest of the will to be read as if D. was not one of the residuary legatees; and, consequently, that in the events that had happened D.'s share was not undisposed of, but went to the other legatees.

Two of the residuary legatees were described as "Edith Beale, daughter of E. J. Beale," and "Violet Beale, daughter of E. J. Beale." E. J. Beale had two and only two daughters, one of whom was named Violet Edith Beale, the other had different first names.

Held, that both daughters were residuary legatees.—RADCLIFFE, RE, YOUNG v. BEALE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 409.

38. Substitution—Original or substitutional—Conjunctions "or" and "and"—Joint tenancy or tenancy in common—Will—Gift after life estate to children, to grandchildren then living "or the issue of such as may have died."—Testator gave his property to trustees upon trust after the death of the survivor of his children to divide the same between and among "his grandchildren then living equally per stirpes and not per capita, or the issue of such as may have died (such issue taking a parent's share only), so that my grandchildren (or their issue) may take their shares equally in loco parentis."

Held, that the gift to the issue of the grandchildren was original and not substitutional, and that a great-grandchild of the testator who predeceased his own parent and the last surviving tenant for life took a vested interest.

Held, also, that upon the whole will the issue of the grandchildren took as tenants in common.

In re Merrick's Trusts, (1866) L. R. 1 Eq. 551, considered and explained.—WOOLLEY, RE, WORMALD v. WOOLLEY, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 206.

39. "Surviving"—Will—Construction.—A will gave portions in trust for each of the testator's children, E., L., and T., for their respective lives, and afterwards for their respective children; provided that if any of his children died without leaving a child entitled to take under the will, the shares of such children should go to their "then surviving" brothers and sisters, if more than one in equal shares, and if only one then to him or her absolutely.

E., L., and T. all survived the testator. E. died first, leaving children. Then L. died without issue, leaving T. surviving.

Held, that upon the true construction of this will the words "then surviving" must receive their ordinary and natural meaning, and that the children of E. took no part of L.'s share.

The decision of the Court of Appeal ([1901] 2 Ch. 738) affirmed.—INDERWICK v. TATCHELL, H.L.; [1903] A. C. 120; 72 L. J. Ch. 393; 88 L. T. 399.

40. Vesting—Gift, after life interest, to children of tenant for life "or legal representatives"—Children dying before period of distribution.—Testator gave a share of his residuary estate to each of his two daughters for their respective lives, and after their deaths their respective shares "to be equally divided between their respective children or legal representatives."

Held, that "representatives" meant the representatives of the tenants for life and not those of the children; that the addition to the gift to the children of the words "or legal representatives" did not operate as a divesting clause, but constituted an alternative gift to arise only in the event of there being no child that took a vested interest; and consequently that all children of the daughters who survived the testator, or were born after his death, took vested interests notwithstanding that they might not have survived their respective mothers.—ROBERTS, RE, PERCIVAL v. ROBERTS, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; [1903] 2 Ch. 200; 72 L. J. Ch. 597; 88 L. T. 505.

41. Vesting—Residue to individuals in shares at twenty-one—Maintenance clause—Income for maintenance of all—Vested or contingent.—It is now a well-settled rule of construction that, where there is a gift by will of a share of residue, to be paid or transferred to the legatee on his attaining a particular age, with a direction that in the meantime the income of the share shall be applied for his maintenance, the share is vested and not contingent.

A testator gave his residuary estate in trust to pay and transfer the same unto and equally between his two children, a son and daughter, on their severally attaining twenty-one, the income "during their respective minorities" to be applied in or towards their maintenance, with a power for the trustees at any time during the "respective minorities" of his said two children to advance any portion "of his or her presumptive share" in or towards "their" advancement in the world.

Held, upon the construction of the will, that the income of each share was to be applied separately for the maintenance of the child entitled to that share alone, and not indiscriminately in respect of both shares, and therefore that, according to the rule above stated, each child took an immediate vested interest in his or her share.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J. ([1902] 1 Ch. 945), reversed.—GOSSLING, RE, GOSSLING v. ELCOCK, C.A.; [1903] 1 Ch. 448; 72 L. J. Ch. 433; 88 L. T. 279.
